Instead of holding back American troops, the brigading of our forces with those of our Allies is to be extended, and continued until the time is ripe for the regrouping of all our units into one grand army. It was announced on May 15 that Generals Pershing, Haig and Petain, would command, under Foch, those divisions of the Allied Army in which their own troops predominated. It was also stated unreservedly that General Foch was in supreme command both in France and in Italy, and that Italy was sending to the French front nearly as many men as was America.

Every time of quiescence on the battle front gives the purveyors of rumors their opportunity. On May 13 German prisoners were reported as declaring that Field Marshal Von Hindenburg was dead. The same rumors brought Gen. von Mackensen to the western front to command one of the armies on the Somme. Following the meeting of the two kaisers at Germany's Great Headquarters, on May 12, there was another crop of rumors, all of which placed Austria more than ever in the dominating grip of her nominal ally. It was rumored that Germany would take even more supervision than formerly over Austria's internal and external policies. Emperor Charles was reported to have made his apologies to Emperor Wilhelm for his peace letters to France, promising not to offend again, and it was rumored further that any new peace moves by Vienna would mask the hand of Berlin.

It was also reported that Germany and Austria had made plans for the creation of four new reigning houses in Lithuania, Courland, Esthonia and Finland, placing Teutonic princes in the thrones of peoples whose self-determination was to be directed by Hohenzollern and Hapsburg dynastic ambitions and necessities.

Emperor Wilhelm recently issued a proclamation concerning Lithuania, in which he announced the restoration of Lithuania as an independent state allied to the German Empire. The proclamation concluded: "We assume the conditions to be concluded will take the interests of the German Empire into account equally with those of Lithuania, and that Lithuania will participate in the war burdens of Germany which secured her liberation." This closing paragraph was taken to indicate that Germany intended to attempt the organization of armies in the Russian provinces which she has added to her Empire. There was a report from the American minister at Stockholm that Germany had served an ultimatum on the Soviet government demanding among other things the military occupation of Moscow and other large Russian cities. There was also a rumor that dissatisfaction in Germany with Austria's failure to participate in the grand offensive was exerting pressure

How to Save From $10 to $25 When Your Radiator Leaks!

Do you know why the experienced car owner no longer sends a leaky radiator to the repair shop?

Because he has found that "X" Liquid repairs leaks more scientifically than by soldering—does a better job in about ten minutes—and saves anywhere up to $25 in repair bills.

Often other parts of the cooling system leak—the pump, gaskets, hose connections, etc. "X" Liquid makes every part watertight. "X" has even repaired a cracked cylinder wall so that it stands 2000 pounds explosive pressure!

It is poured into the radiator, combines with the water and circulates throughout the cooling system. "X" finds every leak, flows through and turns to a metallic-like solid right in the hole. This makes a life-time repair. Vibration can't loosen it.

In using "X" Liquid there is no need to drain the radiator. Simply pour it in—leave it there—and you'll never again be bothered with leaks.

No More Rust or Scale—a Cooler, Smoother Engine

The same "X" Liquid which is used to repair leaks will prevent rust and scale from clogging up the narrow water passages. This improves cooling and saves oil.

Don't confuse "X" with cements, powders, or flaxseed meals in liquid form. "X" cannot clog or harm the cooling system. It is guaranteed to make good or your money back.

"X" Liquid is the only scientific process for making cooling systems Leakproof—Rustproof—Scaleproof.

Large Size $1.50 will do a $25 repair job!
Ford Size 75c will do a $15 repair job!

If your dealer hasn't yet stocked "X" Liquid send us his name and price and we will ship direct.

Southern Methodist General Conference

By REV. H. K. CARROLL, D.D.

ONCE every four years, the fifty-two annual conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, send clerical and lay delegates in equal numbers to the General Conference. The Conference is an impressive body of about 400 men (no women as yet), with a college of thirteen bishops, who preside in turn, with no privilege of debate. Distinguished pastors, secretaries, college presidents and laymen of eminence in law, medicine and business also take part, and among them all, bishops, ministers and laymen who keep alive the best traditions of Southern oratory.

Candler is a name known far and wide. Bishop Candler is a great preacher, trained in law as well as Gospel, a fount of eloquence, wit and humor; Asa Candler, brother of the Bishop, is a first citizen of Atlanta in business, good works, and philanthropy, and is the present mayor. Judge Candler, a lay delegate, adds luster to the name. Bishop Hendrix, senior bishop, is strong, graceful in speech, broad in sympathy, enthusiastic friend of unification. These with other bishops and ministers, eminent leaders, such as Lamar, Thomas, Du Bose, Prettyman, Ainsworth, Moore, Linn, McMurry, Cannon (some destined to be bishops), contribute to the strength and distinction of the General Conference, which occupies Wesley Memorial Church in the heart of the city. Its huge galleries were thronged for the welcome addresses on the evening of the first day, Thursday, May 2.

AMONG the many things the General Conference is expected to do are these: 1. Consider and act upon the report on unification. 2. Deal with issues created by the war. 3. Decide what shall be done with the lay program for reforms. 4. Adopt a plan for a ministerial pension fund. 5. Elect additional bishops. 6. Decide whether there shall be episcopal districts. 7. Decide whether the church constitution needs amendment. 8. Decide whether women members shall be recognized as having full rights in church and conference. 9. Decide whether there shall be missionary bishops. 10. Decide what shall be done for missions, education, etc.

The reunion of the two chief bodies of Methodism, separated by slavery in 1844-5, is evidently earnestly desired by both. The Northern General Conference at Saratoga, in 1916, went for it unitedly and enthusiastically, approving the plan previously accepted by the Southern General Conference of 1914, that is, unification by reorganization. The joint commission of twenty-five bishops, ministers and laymen from each body has already held four sessions. The outcome of the first three meetings has been described in the Christian Herald (see issue of January 2, 1918).

The meeting at St. Louis agreed upon some minor matters, but divided upon the question of Negro representation in the General Conference and hence defeated unification for the time. The difference, in a nutshell, was this: The Southern Commission, while preferring a separate General Conference of Negro Methodists, agreed at Savannah that the Colored Regional Conference should have a fixed representation of ten delegates; the Northern wanted eighteen. At St. Louis, the Southern Commission was willing to accept a minimum of eighteen and a maximum of twenty-six; the Northern asked for a proportional representation of five per cent., or forty-four, approximately. In other words, the principle of Negro representation in the General Conference was agreed to; but the numbers or percentage was not agreed to. The difference is simply a difference of number, and does not seem an insuperable obstacle. As to the attitude of the General Conference, it is well known that the bishops are divided in sentiment, Bishop Candler, chairman of the Southern Commission, opposing the plan as tentatively accepted, in some particulars, with some of his colleagues, while Bishop Hendrix is a warm friend of the plan and is confident it will obtain sooner or later. Other bishops sympathize with this view.

A preliminary struggle took place in the Conference on the third day, when Drs. Cannon, Du Bose, Thomas and others sought to have the report prepared by a committee of four presented to the Conference. The report was read to the Conference by its author, Dr. Frank M. Thomas. It closed with the recommendation that the Commission be continued, with the recognition of the generous, courteous, kindly attitude of the Northern Commissioners, and with these words: "The Commission began its labors in the spirit of prayer and ended them in an atmosphere of brotherly love." The report went to the Committee on Church Relations.

The war spirit of the General Conference, like that of Atlanta, is intense. From the opening session prayers, hymns, addresses, resolutions have been expressive of devotion to the country in its struggle, along with the Allies, against military autocracy and tyranny, and a resolution was unanimously adopted on the third day, assuring the President of the firm and loyal support of Conference and Church in all measures for the vigorous prosecution of the war.

gether in reasonable peace and good-will, even under the stress and strain of war. From which I conclude that the hope of St. Paul, the prayer of Jesus, and the dream of the centuries are well within the realm of possibility.

In the new day now dawning, the Church must lead and set the example by putting her own house in order. The sooner Christians get together, the sooner will nations federate. No one recognized this more than the statesman whose spirit inspired this message. A close friend of the President, Mrs. Pomeroy, once asked him why he did not join the church, since he was such a devout believer in the things of the Kingdom. To which Mr. Lincoln replied, "When any church will inscribe over its altar as its sole qualification for membership the Saviour's condensed statement of both the Law and the Gospel, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself; that church will I join with all my heart." For myself, I am praying most earnestly that such a Church Universal shall be the offering which the followers of Christ will present to God when this war is over, for then will he present to us a world made one through Him who is the all and in all. What an extraordinary opportunity for the Church of the Living God!

Brethren, of every clime, race and creed, I salute you. Behold, the centuries look down upon us and the nations look up to us. I challenge you one and all to light your torches at Lincoln's altar fire, and dedicate your lives to the completion of Lincoln's task.

Jesus Faces Betrayal and Denial

Mark 14: 10-72

The Memorial Supper

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE now confront a tremendous chapter with material for many lessons. But the intention of our Lesson Committee is to make the Lord's Supper the central theme and to study the situation which Jesus and the twelve faced as they met together in the upper room. It is familiar ground, superficially, but the wisest students confess that there are points of the deepest importance that are not quite clear to them even now. It teems with practical suggestions for our own fellowship together as disciples of Christ, and raises some heart-searching questions too. At the time when his chosen twelve are most disappointing we see him getting humble but hearty cooperation from some obscure disciple in the preparation of the room used as a meeting-place. It was "furnished and ready." Oftentimes we think our duties in the kingdom are lowly, but if Jesus asks our help in such simple things as this we can have the joy of instant readiness to do what we can.

Jesus knew that he was to be betrayed. What a horrible sensation for any one to have, and harder to bear the more refined the nature. Is there any offense more heinous than betrayal of a friend? There is something hideous in the treachery that hands over a trusting companion to his enemies. Jesus was too popular with the common people, especially the Galilean pilgrims, for the priests to risk seizing him publicly. They wanted to lay hold on him secretly, by night, and get the trial and execution over before even rumor could reach most of his real friends. Horrible as is the malignity of the sanctimonious priests who could not enter a heathen palace on a feast day, the sin of Judas is more horrible and less easily explained. Why did he do it? Lately it has become the fashion to find excuses for him, even to the pretense that he deliberately sought to fulfil prophecy. But Jesus' loathing of the traitor makes such palliation impossible. It is a mystery still, how human perverseness can sin against love. The Gospels seem to point to greed for money as a weak spot in his character. Mark links the betrayer's bargain with the anointing at Bethany, and it may be that pique and hurt feelings had something to do with it. Or it may have been that he expected an earthly kingdom as the others did, and turned against the Master when he realized it was not to be.

The feast was clouded and robbed of its joy by a sense of impending calamity. Jesus, with his heart torn in outraged love, cannot keep silent about the betrayer. What sorrow came over the group around the table! How well they knew their weakness as each asked, awe-stricken, "Lord, is it I?" Their question called for a negative answer to reassure their self-distrust. Jesus emphasized the tragedy of it; a familiar friend, one who dipped in the same dish, had sold him for gain.

Our Shadowed Feasts

So often in our gatherings in church or home, even on the most memorable occasions, we are not fully and wholly united. What is wrong? Some one has been betraying Christ? For Christ prayed then that his disciples might be one. We would do well to ask ourselves, or rather to ask our Lord, "Can it be I that am breaking the loyalty, the unity, of the cause of Christ?" The disciples were better than we; each inquired concerning himself. We are all too apt to look around at others and to forget to examine our own consciences. If the family group is unhappy, and some one is surely to blame, "Lord, is it I?" If the class is going to pieces, or the school is running down, and some one is neglecting duty, "Lord, is it I?"

The Bread and the Cup

As the celebration of the paschal feast closed, Jesus solemnly and impres-sively took the bread, and after repeating the blessing distributed the pieces among them. Each looked at him inquiringly and waited to know his meaning. "Take it," he said: "this is my body." Then he poured the wine for each. "Drink ye all: this is my blood of the covenant." What new significance was added there to old-time ceremony! His body was to be sacrificed, and yet that sacrifice was to feed human souls. His blood was soon to be shed, yet it should refresh and heal weary men throughout the ages to come. Betrayal meant death, but death did not mean defeat. It meant larger service and sublimer victory. The shedding of his blood was the seal to a greater covenant than that of Abraham. Into its blessings might enter all the tribes of earth.

How awestricken must the disciples have been! They could not begin to understand. What eager questionings and wondrous teachings followed, as are partially revealed in the Gospel of John. Mark's brevity is characteristic and leaves the true impression of a band of men who did not even yet understand what their leader had in mind. But they did see in him a Victorious One, joining in song and prayer, and then calmly going forth to suffer and die.

Value of the Observance to Us

Some Christians, happily few in number, have disparaged the Communion because of the superstitions which have gathered round it in the dark ages. Now, thousands of Protestants entirely ignore the observance. It grieves us to see so many get up from the pews and go out when the Supper begins. For this memorial rite can be made, and should be, the very climax of all the observances of the Church. Its teaching value is tremendous. It has the great psychological advantage of being acted out by all. It is a break from the monotony of talk from the pulpit. It speaks for itself. We who work among the children should explain its lessons to them so that they may understand at least in part before they first participate and especially that they may not begin with wrong ideas.

Remembrance of Christ. "Do this in remembrance of me." For a company of people to be perfectly quiet for a few minutes and for all to think of Jesus Christ, is a blessing to the whole community and every home that is represented. Just to let his life and character, his sacrificial death and resurrection bear their own testimony; without question, without argument, to let every man look into the Master's face; that is communion with God, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Family Fellowship. What a penetrating, powerful sense of fellowship the Holy Meal brings! We look around upon each other with tender hearts. We think more kindly of the erring and the blundering. After all, we are brethren, children of one Father, and all in his sight weak and foolish enough. The common meal, touched with glory by its associations, makes us members together of a beloved community. We think of those who have gone on to the higher communion. We remember the stalwart saints of old regardless of sect or land. All are ours, whether Paul or Apollos or Cephas. We think of the other churches where we have worshipped and of the larger tasks of the Kingdom in our time. We are bigger, and better, and holier men and women.

Divine Care and Forgiveness. We remember God's goodness unto us. He has given us day by day our daily bread. We were brought low and he helped us. We walked through the valley of the shadow of death and feared no evil. We cried unto him in contrition and he delivered us from our sins and remembered them against us no more. We stumbled and fell, but seventy times seven he lifted us. For such a Father, so ready to give good gifts, so plenteous in lovingkindness, shall we not care for his other sheep—his lost and wandering sons? Shall we not give, even as we have received, and forgive others their trespasses against us? So at last we go forth feeling like the men who had eaten bread with the Lord at Emmaus.

In dealing with our boys and girls we must study to make the Lord's Supper combine reverence and joy; it must be solemn and heart-searching, yet in no wise gloomy or depressing. In childish hearts the dignified repetition of the words of the ordinance have lasting value for spiritual nurture. The most precious associations will gather around the observance. I cannot hear the hymn, "Majestic Sweetness Sits Enthroned," without the profoundest stirring of recollections of the communion in the church of my boyhood, where it was always sung as the hymn before they went out." In our home church now, the twenty-third Psalm forms a part of the order, and young people have told me that it has taken new and memorable meaning from its connection with the remembrance of Jesus.

The Betrayal and Denial

Now we must look together at the scenes in the garden and the courtyard in Jerusalem. Familiar and sad enough they are. A false friend and a group of weak friends, and one calm, poised, lonely Man. After his agony of spirit he is equal to the emergency. Here come

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Live Items for Missionary Sunday

WHEN the call went out from the World's Sunday School Association headquarters in New York to the Sunday schools in different lands to do their part in helping the starving children of Syria and Armenia the response was immediate and generous for these children who give out of their little and who often give their all.

One girl in the fourth year common school of the Congregational Church at Ping Yang, Korea, writes:

"It may seem strange to send such a small bit of money to you. But as I receive something from my father daily I have saved this much by not buying things for myself for some time. I send it to you and ask you to please send it to the orphan children in Bible lands."

FRUIT HARUTA.

A Turkish boy who had as his particular treasure a Turkish gold pound, equal in value to about $3.70, parted with it for the needy children of Syria when he learned of their utter need through his Sunday school teacher. These are the children's mites to match the widow's mite.

From Egypt's children has come the large sum of $2,600 for these sufferers. Over $32 of this came from the Orthodox Copts of the small village of Ghannim. They heard of the need through friends in another village. They speak of the gift as very small, but in reality it means a great deal for these simple country folk.

Another village named Aghana made a joint offering combining the gifts of the Orthodox and the Evangelical Churches. The omdeh (mayor) of the village wrote a very earnest letter conveying the greetings of both congregations and saying that he and his townsmen wished to be associated with the Sunday school movement in this work of kindness for the suffering children in Turkey. He closed his letter with a prayer that through the new year we might enjoy the peace and presence of the Lord Jesus.

This incident is most significant from the fact that for the past generation and more there has been intense bitterness both in cities and villages between the Orthodox Coptic Church and the Evangelical or Protestant. An Egyptian friend, when told of this joint offering, said he had never heard of such a thing in this country.

From Brazil's children has come $500, and from Japan's, $300. These are the first offerings from these countries for a world need.

And now Mr. Trowbridge, the World's Sunday School secretary for Moslem children, is in Jerusalem distributing these World's Sunday School gifts to the orphaned and needy. Nearly $200,000 has already been applied to this relief work. He is establishing workshops the rough temple police with torches and staves. And among them Judas with his mocking greeting and traitorous kiss. The Greek says, "kissed him effusively"! With lips calling him Master, and with lips saluting him with love, but with heart full of malice and greed. Shocking to us all, and we trust that few in the church share such guilt. Jesus rebukes the officials and taunts them with their cowardice when he taunted publicly in the temple.

And the disciples all left him and fled! The Man of Sorrows was forsaken in his hour of need by every one of those for whom he had done so much. We ask ourselves guiltily if we have not done likewise when his cause has been hard bested in our day. After the silent march through the night to the city, we get the picture of Peter, standing in the firelight, directly and repeatedly denying Christ. Yes, with oaths and cursing repudiating any relationship to him whom he first of all men had deliberately hailed as the Son of God! Poor Peter, "overtaken in a fault"! Let those without sin among us cast the first stone of reproach.

in the lace industry, developing orphanages and trade schools. Sixteen hundred Bethlehem refugees were cared for at Jaffa.

Several thousand of the refugees from Armenia had been for three years working their way to Jerusalem through the wilderness east of the Jordan. Mr. Trowbridge had once been a missionary in Armenia. When these miserable folks met him at the crossing of the Jordan near Jericho, some recognized him with tears of gratitude. When they later saw the Mount of Olives they broke out in exclamations of praise. Work is being found for them, and food and clothing.

Wayside Sunday Schools in Korea

One of the splendid things in Korea is the way churches have been built out of little wayside Sunday schools. Some 2,500 children have been gathered into these schools recently by one denomination, the Southern Presbyterian. These schools are as simple as they can well be—a gathering of little unwashed, uncared-for children under the roadside tree, in a friendly house, or on a veranda. There is practically no organization at all, but the children are held together at first by curiosity, a potent factor in the East, and then by love.

Take the beginning of one such school. A missionary well supplied with brightly colored pictures or text cards (probably sent by some Sunday school in America through the Surplus Material Department of the World's Sunday School Association, Metropolitan Tower, New York) goes to some village and sits under some tree or by the side of the road. Very soon one child and another gathers in front of him to examine him and hear what he has to say. The missionary says a few words and perhaps sings a verse or two of "Jesus Loves Me" and gives each of the children a card and tells them to come again next Sunday and bring others.

Next Sunday he comes to the same place and the children are there to meet him.

A few will perhaps spell out with him a verse or a text. Some Sundays later the children will learn to look for his coming, and the class will take on regular proportions, and quite a number will join shyly in the singing.

It may be that a child or friendly neighbor will offer his house, his yard or a room, and from that time more or less regular work may be begun. Some "schools" we have seen have met Sunday after Sunday through a long bitter winter under a tree by the roadside, but the good done was not to be measured.

Since these schools started a few years ago thousands upon thousands have been reached. Just the other day a Korean said: "It is curious that when I used to go to such and such a village the children sang all sorts of heathen songs, but now I hear only 'Jesus Loves Me.'"

Without Warning

By
 MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT was only a spring shower, but it swept up suddenly from out of the horizon and beat upon the world with silver lances of rain. We, scurrying for cover in the shelter of an old barn, wondered why showers had such a disconcerting habit of blotting out the sunshine all in a moment and drenching new summer frocks.

"When we started out," I found myself saying resentfully, "there wasn't a hint of this!"

The friend brushed a few drops of water from a filmy ruffle before she answered.

"I often wonder," she said finally, "why things so often happen without any warning. It hardly seems fair to have showers come on a day as bright as this one was!"

The shabby roof began to leak, and we moved deeper into the shadow of the barn, while the great drops splashed in at the doorway.

"Oh, well," I answered, "it isn't doing us any real harm. If there hadn't been some sort of a shelter it might have ruined our clothes."

"But there was a shelter," finished my friend. She smiled. "There usually is a shelter!" she said.

The rain beat down as we stood there in the dimness of the old barn. And then, quite as suddenly as it had started, the rain faded away, and, all at once, miraculously the sun swept from behind a cloud.

We stepped over the broken door-sill of the old barn and out into a world that seemed like a great canvas freshly painted with paints that were fragrant as well as bright. The new leaves on the trees that stood sentinel-like along the way seemed greener than ever before, and the meadow flowers were sparkling in the sun. Even the sky seemed clearer, and the road, which had been a bit dusty, had become a brown satin ribbon for our feet to walk upon.

"After all—" I observed, "after all, this shower was worth while!"

"Even," added my friend, "if it did come without warning!" And she laughed.

THE things that come without warning are often worth more to us than they would be if we had time in which to prepare for them. The emergencies that force out latent bravery, the situations that bring to light unexpected genius, would entirely fail in their object if they could be planned for with more or less elaboration. The boy who saved the brave land of Holland—you have all heard the story—by sitting through the night, faint from pain and exhaustion, with his little fingers held tight against a fatal hole in the supposedly strongest dike, would have lost his chance for fame had he known that the leak was going to occur, though he might have done heroic work in preparing to defeat the intruding flood.

You've probably, every one of you, known some person who was strengthened by the unexpected happening. You've known wasters who, thrown upon their own resources, have become splendid men and women with real purposes in life; and you've known cowards who, in the time of fire or flood or excitement, have proved their strength and have never again been cowards. You've heard of unpleasant things happening unexpectedly, that have made great and decidedly pleasant differences in many lives.

I heard the story, once, of a train wreck that occurred near an orphan asylum. It was not a serious affair, but there was some repairing to be done, and so a rich woman who was in one of the cars decided that, while it was being done, she would go through the asylum on a tour of inspection. She wasn't particularly curious about the place; but it was a nice day, and the building was not unattractive, and she had read all of her magazines, and she had nothing else to do. So she left the train and strolled across the orphan asylum lawn and in through the open door.

She was, as I have said, a rich woman. And she had always been, up to that time, a selfish woman. For she had never thought of sharing her wealth with one less fortunate than herself. That visit to the orphan asylum opened her eyes to a new world, a world of small children who had nothing of the plenty that she had always known and accepted as her due.

She had stepped through the asylum's open door with only one object—to kill time. She wandered through the different rooms, in the matron's excited charge, with a growing interest. She began to ask questions and the answers that she received made her heart fill with pity.

"I wonder," she said finally, "how I could help?"

The matron led her back to a comfortable little study. And they sat there until the train whistle blew, talking. And the rich woman heard of many ways in which she could help. When she left, she made a promise to come back again, and to make her second coming one that would mean something.

Under ordinary circumstances that rich woman would never have visited a public institution. She would have shuddered delicately away from the thought of such a thing. But, because she happened to be near such an institution when a train wreck happened without warning, she did visit it. And that visit was the beginning of many changes in many lives. Comforts and conveniences that the asylum had never dreamed of were installed; the worried matron was able to go to bed at night without tossing sleeplessly and wondering about too slim budgets; and the laughter of little children made glad a certain stately old manor house that had been childless ever since the rich woman grew up.

DO not look askance at the things that happen without warning. Because there's a Hand behind every happening, a tender Hand with a definite purpose—a Hand that is at once a shelter (for there's always a shelter!) and a guide.

The spring shower made the earth more beautiful. Of course, if we had known that it was coming we would have stayed, safely and sanely, at home. And if we had done so we would have missed the fresh beauty of the Maytime country after the rain. But the shower came without warning. And so we, watching it, were able to read a symbolism into it.

A Child's Wonderful Memory

LITTLE Grace Parks, age four and one-half years, is one of the most wonderful of child Bible students. She cannot read or write yet, although she is learning both; but her memory is crystal clear. She has memorized a number of Bible passages, also the names of the twelve apostles, the names of the twelve sons of Jacob, the names of the sixteen judges of Israel, the ten plagues in order, the chain of events in the six days of creation, the fifteenth Psalm, and many other parts of the Old and New Testaments. Grace is not a precocious or abnormal child. She is well-grown for her years, bright-faced, with a merry temperament, and gives promise of growing up into a capable and useful womanhood. Mrs. A. S. Steel, Chattanooga, Tenn., founder and manager of the Home for Needy Colored Children there, is Grace's teacher. She has a number of other children about Grace's age, who are almost Grace's equal in Bible accomplishments. Mrs. Steel's system has demonstrated the capacity children have for absorbing Bible knowledge, which will stand them in good stead in after years. The Home is located at 1 Straight Street, Chattanooga. The good work that is done there is known to many readers of the Christian Herald, who have been patrons of it in past years. In thirty-four years Mrs. Steel has taken in, clothed, educated and trained over 1,500 children of both sexes. At a recent annual meeting of the Tennessee State Board of Charities, held in Nashville, the work of this Home was highly endorsed.

Epworth League Topic. Acts 22:10; 26:16-19, Judges 7:21

THERE is a place for every one which that one can fill better than anybody else. Many persons, without doubt, fail to find their place, and their lives are fretted away in uncongenial and unprofitable work, which brings them neither fame nor satisfaction of heart. For this parents are often to blame. They choose a career for their son or daughter; plan the education for that career or get them a job that is supposed to lead toward it, thereby starting a train of fortuitous circumstances which winds a steadily enclosing web about the child for whose welfare they planned, stunting his growth, denying his ambitions, perhaps robbing him of his ideals. Others start out on a chosen career with the idea that their own force of character and the power of their will can get them anything they want. It frequently brings financial success, worldly position and the plaudits of the crowd—an empty shell when old age closes in. There is only one way to make sure that you have found your place in the world. Paul found the way, and when he found it he was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision. The first requisite for finding your place in the world is to find Jesus Christ as your Saviour. His will for you will fit you to your place and help you fill it. If you don't know his will, if you have not yet had your heavenly vision, you will find it on your knees when you have placed all of self upon the altar of his will. He may lead you along the lines of your long-time ambition. He may turn you into a channel you had not thought to follow. You can be sure, if you wait for your vision and are not disobedient thereto, that you will not only find your place in the world but find with it the power to fill it.

Progressive Christians

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. 11 Peter 1:1-11

WHEN an automobile stalls, there is usually some mechanical difficulty that can be righted; when a horse balks, there are physical means for starting him again; when a Christian ceases to progress, a fresh baptism of the Spirit is necessary for a new start. Progress is the normal handmaid of faith. Having washed our sins white in the blood of Calvary, we press on toward the mark of our high calling in Christ Jesus—Christian perfection. It is a long road, a steep climb, yet a happy and joyous pilgrimage. Peter expressed it as a sum in addition. Having believed, he would have us add to our faith virtue, which is the keeping of the law. Then, through the keeping of the law and our faith, we are to learn something of Him whose Spirit is expressed in the law. Thus we gain knowledge, and having knowledge of God we are less hasty in our judgments, less impetuous in our statements, less riotous in our indulgences. Thus we accomplish temperance, and it is a short step from temperance to patience. When all of these are added, godliness or God-likeness is not far away. Brotherly kindness is naturally to be expected. Charity loves the company of those who are kind. And if, in your life, you have completed this sum, it is but natural that you should be neither barren nor unfruitful in the things of the Kingdom. A life thus multiplied must bless the world, even as it is itself blessed from above.

Scouting and the Bible Class

By JAMES G. CHANDLER

Bible-School Superintendent and Deputy Commissioner, Boy Scouts of America

THE side issues of the regular program of the Boy Scouts of America are very apt to become the main issue, and then real scouting goes a-glimmering. At least, that is my opinion as based on experience here.

Some seven years ago this proved the case with a troop we tried to organize—basket-ball, baseball, an occasional hike, were enjoyed, but not even a tenderfoot Scout grew out of it. These games held the interest and proved beneficial to only a few of the boys.

Eight months ago we realized that we had a boy problem (a misnomer—it is a man's problem).

By past experience, athletic clubs, social clubs, etc., proved a practical failure; and so this decision was reached and followed closely—to organize a troop of Boy Scouts, giving them to understand that the Scout program was to be followed almost to the letter.

As a result, troop No. 26 at the end of eight months boasts a perfect organization, with four Merit Badge Scouts, six First Class Scouts and nineteen Second Class.

The "Bo Square" Bible-Class has grown from nine to nineteen and has better discipline. The Scout troop is also feeding other boys' classes of the school.

Scouting is Christianity made practical for boys, and it becomes the natural step for Scouts to become followers of the Christ.

Build a Bee Hive

I GATHER wealth for my master wherever I am, in city, suburb or country.

I work twelve hours a day, and am content.

I ask neither food nor clothing and only a box for a shelter.

My domain is all outdoors; I trespass unhindered wherever I will.

For all men fear my wrath, admire my industry, and crave the fruits of my labor.

I am the honey bee.

Why not let me work for you? The United States Department of Agriculture has launched a campaign to increase the nation's food supply by producing more honey. There are tons of potential honey in every vacant lot, suburb, and pasture. Bees will work for you wherever you live, provided you know how to treat them. Big Increase in Porcelain Efficiency

The Romance of Experiment 3450

TEN YEARS of constant research and experiment—day after day of unremitting laboratory work—with the laboratory furnaces glowing night after night!

Thousands of different combinations and mixtures of materials gathered from all over the world! Each carefully recorded formula tested in the laboratory furnaces under different degrees of heat!

Steady improvement in spark plug porcelains all this time—but no great gain upon the increasingly severe requirements of new developments in gasoline motors!

3449 different experiments—until—finally—the startling results of Experiment 3450 showed a long stride ahead in all the essential requirements for spark plug insulators.

Champion 3450 porcelain is so far ahead of any other insulator that it stands today clearly and distinctly in a class by itself—unchallenged.

Literally, Experiment 3450 has developed undreamed-of qualities in porcelain for spark plug insulation.

Even the startling qualities recently developed in steel, by scientific heat treating, are no more romantic.

The microscopic views below show a great similarity in the recent development of new superior qualities in steel and the development of this new superior Champion 3450 porcelain.

So Champion Dependability takes on new meaning—for no spark plug can be more dependable than this insulator.

Why We Should Bathe Internally

ADDS MANY YEARS TO AVERAGE LIFE

By R. W. Beal

MUCH has been said and volumes have been written describing at length the many kinds of baths civilized man has indulged in from time to time. Every possible resource of the human mind has been brought into play to fashion new methods of bathing, but strange as it may seem, the most important as well as the most beneficial of all baths, the "Internal Bath," has been given little thought. The reason for this is probably due to the fact that few people seem to realize the tremendous part that internal bathing plays in the acquiring and maintaining of health.

If you were to ask a dozen people to define an internal bath, you would have as many different definitions, and the probability is that not one of them would be correct. To avoid any misconception as to what constitutes an internal bath, let it be said that a hot water enema is no more an internal bath than a bill of fare is a dinner.

If it were possible and agreeable to take the great mass of thinking people to witness an average post-mortem, the sights they would see and the things they would learn would prove of such lasting benefit, and impress them so profoundly, that further argument in favor of internal bathing would be unnecessary to convince them. Unfortunately, however, it is not possible to do this, profitable as such an experience would doubtless prove to be. There is, then, only one other way to get this information into their hands, and that is by acquainting them with such knowledge as will enable them to appreciate the value of this long-sought-for health-producing necessity.

Few people realize what a very little thing is necessary sometimes to improve their physical condition. Also they have almost no conception of how a little carelessness, indifference or neglect can be the fundamental cause of the most virulent disease. For instance, that universal disorder from which almost all humanity is suffering, known as "constipation," "auto-intoxication," "auto-infection," and a multitude of other terms, is not only curable, but preventable, through the consistent practice of internal bathing.

How many people realize that normal functioning of the bowels and a clean intestinal tract make it impossible to become sick? "Man of to-day is only fifty per cent. efficient." Reduced to simple English this means that most men are trying to do a man's portion of work on half a man's power. This applies equally to women.

That it is impossible to continue to do this indefinitely must be apparent to all. Nature never intended the delicate human organism to be operated on a hundred per cent. overload. A machine could not stand this and not break down, and the body certainly cannot do more than a machine. There is entirely too much unnecessary and avoidable sickness in the world.

How many people can you name, including yourself, who are physically vigorous, healthy and strong? The number is appallingly small.

It is not a complex matter to keep in condition, but it takes a little time, and in these strenuous days people have time to do everything else necessary for the attainment of happiness but the most essential thing of all, that of giving their bodies their proper care.

Would you believe that five or ten minutes of time devoted to systematic internal bathing can make you healthy and maintain your physical efficiency indefinitely? Granting that such a simple procedure as this will do what is claimed for it, is it not worth while to learn more about that which will accomplish this end? Internal Bathing will do this, and it will do it for people of all ages and in all conditions of health and disease.

People don't seem to realize, strange to say, how important it is to keep the body free from accumulated body-waste poisons. Their doing so would prevent the absorption into the blood of the poisonous excretions of the body, and health would be the inevitable result.

If you would keep your blood pure, your heart normal, your eyes clear, your complexion clean, your head keen, your blood pressure normal, your nerves relaxed, and be able to enjoy the vigor of youth in your declining years, practise internal bathing and begin to-day.

Now that your attention has been called to the importance of internal bathing, it may be that a number of questions will suggest themselves to your mind. You will probably want to know WHAT an Internal Bath is, WHY people should take them, and the WAY to take them. These and countless other questions are answered in a booklet entitled "THE WHAT, THE WHY AND THE WAY OF INTERNAL BATHING," written by Doctor Chas. A. Tyrrell, the inventor of the "J. B. L. Cascade," whose lifelong study and research along this line make him the preeminent authority on this subject. Not only had internal bathing saved and prolonged Dr. Tyrrell's own life, but the lives of multitudes of individuals have been equally spared and prolonged. No other book has ever been written containing such a vast amount of practical information to the business man, the worker and the housewife. All that is necessary to secure this book is to write to Dr. Chas. A. Tyrrell at 134 West 65th Street, New York, and mention having read this article in Christian Herald, and same will be immediately mailed to you free of all cost or obligation.

Perhaps you realize now, more than ever, the truth of these statements, and if the reading of this article will result in a proper appreciation on your part of the value of internal bathing, it will have served its purposes. What you will want to do now is to avail yourself of the opportunity for learning more about the subject, and your writing for this book will give you that information. Do not put off doing this, but send for the book now, while the matter is fresh in your mind.

"Procrastination is the thief of time." A thief is one who steals something. Don't allow procrastination to cheat you out of your opportunity to get this valuable information, which is free for the asking. If you would be natural, be healthy. It is unnatural to be sick. Why be unnatural, when it is such a simple thing to be well?

Practical Patriotism and a Meatless Breakfast

THE motto for today's conference is laid to our hand by the Food Administration Bureau, with which we are in faithful cooperation:

"Pick up the plow where it stands in the furrow. Patriotism is the practical doing of the next job."

From all quarters of the Union come to us proofs that our countrywomen are undertaking in good earnest the patriotic duty of dispensing with wheat flour in cookery. When the Food Administration first laid the subject before us, a vast majority of housewives were inclined to treat it lightly, even contemptuously. Many did not grasp the fact that the Commission "meant business," and that the need for action was real and imminent. Remonstrances, plaintive, querulous and incredulous, were rained upon the press and into the ears of all who would listen.

It is gratifying to note the changed tone of discussions as to the necessity of obedience to the stringent regulations imposed upon every household. Those who two months ago fretted like peevish children over the accumulation of "substitutes" in the larder are ready now to take counsel together as to the advantages of the new order of culinary operations. In short, the American housemother is showing of what sterling stuff she is made, and her eagerness to bear her part in the conflict that is convulsing the nations.

From a Kentucky family, in the very heart of some of the finest wheat-growing lands, we have the cheerful announcement: "We are having wheat bread at only one meal a day, using rye flour and corn-products instead, curtailing our use of wheat bread practically two-thirds, and doing it gladly. If our boys 'need the goods,' and the government can send them, it is all right!"

A Pennsylvania correspondent of the Corner writes: "Rye flour makes excellent paste for papering walls, etc., and saves the precious wheat. I get along nicely with the substitutes, but find that one has to make a regular business of it to get them used up acceptably, even when a little flour is added. And we all acknowledge now that the use of this must be as sparing as possible."

"A Daughter of the American Revolution," Mrs. E. R. L. (Franklin, Pa.), whose great-grandfather fought at Bunker Hill, writes in reply to the request for rye flour breads: "Can you make room for a recipe for the good old 'rye'n Injun bread' upon which our patriot forebears lived and waxed strong? I copy the formula from a book compiled by my own grandmother—a Massachusetts woman. As will be seen, this is the semi-weekly baking for a big family:

"Mash six potatoes smooth and soft with a cup of white flour and a quart of warm water. Stir into this sponge a tablespoonful of lard or other shortening and one of brown sugar. Beat five minutes and set to rise all night or at least five hours. In the morning sift into your breadtray a quart of rye-flour and three pints of Indian meal; two teaspoonfuls of salt and one of baking soda or saleratus. Sift all together three times. Now stir into the risen sponge a good tablespoonful of molasses and work the sponge into the flour and meal you have prepared, adding warm water enough as you go on to make a dough. Knead for ten minutes upon a floured board and set to rise in a tolerably warm place. When it has doubled its bulk work over again for five minutes and divide into loaves, putting these into greased pans for the last rising. This should last about an hour. Then bake in a very moderate oven for two hours at least. Rye bread requires slow and long baking. My grandmother sometimes left her 'rye'n Injun' all night in the oven, letting the lessening heat finish the job.

"Bread made thus is sweet, wholesome and full of nutriment that makes bones and muscle strong and keeps the system generally normal. C. B. M., Connecticut."

A Meatless Breakfast

When oranges are tolerably reasonable in price and fair in quality, there is no better way of preparing the stomach to "break its fast" than by eating half a one, extracting all the juice and letting the pulp alone. Grapes, in full season, are the next best first course

Oatmeal Porridge

We have here an article of food which the veriest tyro in the gentle art of cookery takes it for granted she can prepare. As we have mentioned in a former chapter, she holds the like opinion with regard to boiling rice. If she has ever heard the proverb, "There's wit goes to the boiling of eggs," she laughs it to scorn. Kathleen-Dinah supposes that "any fool knows how to cook porridge." Will our reader bear with me while I relate briefly how this homely dish may be made almost elegant? In the first place, soak it over night in clean water. In the morning drain and cover well with slightly salted hot water. Set to cook in a double boiler, and as soon as it begins to smoke beat up from the bottom as you would whip eggs. Repeat this every five minutes and cook until you have a lumpless jelly, instead of a granulated paste that sticks to the teeth and clogs the digestive organs. Serve with cream. Some like to add sugar. The native-born Scotchman will scout the practice as a foreign innovation that spoils the flavor.

Codfish Balls

One pound of codfish, boiled and cold. Pick it to pieces with a silver fork, removing every bit of bone and skin, and shredding it fine. Add an equal bulk of mashed potato, and work into the mass a teaspoonful of warmed butter and a tablespoonful of milk to make a rather stiff batter. Form this into balls or cakes with well-floured hands and set them on the ice for some hours. It is a good plan to make them overnight if you wish to have them firm for breakfast. Drop into deep hot fat or dripping, and fry to a delicate brown. Drain off every drop of grease in a hot collander and serve. Stripes of stale bread from which the crust has been pared before it is quickly toasted and lightly buttered, accord better with fishballs than the heavier "rye and Indian," or hot muffins or biscuits.

In fulfillment of a promise a week old, I offer today a "registered" dessert, dinner or luncheon, compounded of barley and so few other ingredients that it lays a light tax on time and purse.

Barley Blanc Mange

Soak one cupful of pearl barley over night in four cups of water. In the morning put it over the fire in a double boiler and simmer until soft. When this stage is reached, drain off the superfluous water, if there is any, turn in two cupfuls of milk and cook half an hour. Sweeten to taste; flavor with the grated orange peel; add half a cupful of seedless raisins; turn into a mold wet with cold water, and put aside to form. When very cold eat with cream and sugar.

MARION HARLAND.

Economy in Church Work

THE Home Missions Council, an interdenominational association of home mission and church extension boards in the United States, has issued an appeal to the churches, asking that in this time, while our nation is trying to make the world safe for democracy and to abolish war as a means of settling international differences, the missionary and other agencies of the churches should economize in money and men in order that no waste of energy should impair the spiritual efficiency of the national life. Therefore the Council suggests that the denominations merge their groups in worship and release for other forms of service one or more of the ministers in overlapping parishes, and asks all denominational committees, societies and boards dispensing home mission funds to reach agreements with other denominations by which all duplications of money aid in the same community shall be eliminated and workers utilized for unhampered community work, no energies and resources being wasted by sectarian competitions or duplications.

The Prophetic Conference Programme

"It is a happy coincidence" said J. Davis Adams, Executive Secretary of the Bible Conference on Prophecy in Philadelphia, "that the dates of our Conference run from May 28 to 30, and now comes the proclamation of President Wilson, setting aside Memorial Day, May 30, for a day for National confession and for prayer for the success of our Armies in the World War. It is providential."

Three sessions of the Conference will be held daily in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia. In the morning from 10.00 to 12.00 the afternoon from 2.00 to 4.00, and in the evening from 7.30 to 10.00 o'clock. From 12.45 to 1.45 there will be held a Ministers' meeting when the speakers will address themselves especially to the ministers of the city and visiting ministers.

The Executive Secretary says that there is every indication of a large attendance. Requests have come from people all over the country, but especially from the Atlantic Seaboard and the Middle Western States, to send the literature of the Conference to their friends. A large number of applications come daily for lodging from people who are planning to attend. They come from Florida, North Carolina, the New England States, Iowa, Illinois, Pennsylvania and other states, and even from Canada.

"The program for the Conference," said Mr. Adams "has been built with a threefold object in view: First: To build up a constructive, co-ordinated teaching; Second: To carry a spirit of worship throughout the Conference, avoiding the tension which would be aroused by controversy; Third: To strongly stress the evangelistic note.

"We will ask every teacher to stick to his text, bearing in mind that these addresses will be stenographically reported and published in book form when the Conference is over, by the Christian Herald of New York City."

The first address of the Conference will be "Hath God Spoken?" by Dr. Harris H. Gregg of Winnipeg, Canada. Dr. Gregg will treat the inspiration and authority of the Bible. Dr. Scofield will speak on "What is Prophecy and Why Study It?" He will bring out whether its fulfillment is an evidence of God, or in what lies its value? After this will follow an address on "What is the Greatest Question Jesus Ever Asked?" by Dr. William B. Riley, of the First Church of Minneapolis, Minn. The first evening address will be "Did the Cross of Christ Fulfill All the Promises of God?" by Dean W. L. Pettingill of the Philadelphia School of the Bible and will cover the atonement, the humiliation; is the Church a Spiritual kingdom; were the disciples mistaken in their kingdom views, etc. Dr. Mark Matthews, ex-Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, pastor of one of the largest Presbyterian Churches of the Northwest, will speak on the "Doctrine of Our Lord's Return."

On Wednesday, the general theme will be the return of our Lord as related to the present conditions and the first address will be "Where is Christ Now and What is He Doing?" by Dr. C. I. Scofield of Douglaston, L. I., the editor of the Scofield Reference Bible. Dr. James M. Gray of the Moody Bible Institute will speak on "God's Purpose in this Dispensation." Dr. A. E. Thompson, pastor of the American Church in Jerusalem for fifteen years, and who was driven out of the city by the Turks, at the time of the atrocious Armenian deportation, will speak on the "Capture of Jerusalem." He will tell the story of this capture, showing Jerusalem's value to the world from God's standpoint, its place in fulfilled prophecy. This address will be followed by Dr. Gray on the "Regathering of Israel in Unbelief," showing the relation of the Zionist movement to the return. He will treat the question from the standpoint of the Jews as a Nation. In the evening Rev. Dr. Cortland Myers of Tremont Baptist Temple, Boston, Mass., will speak on "The War on German Theology." Rev. P. W. Philpot of Hamilton, Ontario, will give an address on "Coming Events Cast Their Shadows Before Them."

Thursday's program will treat the return of our Lord in the program of Prophecy and make an application of the message of the Conference. The first address of the day, by Dr. Gregg, will be on "What is to Become of the Church?" Dr. P. W. Philpot will answer the question "Will There Be Any Tears in Heaven and Why?" In the afternoon session, Dr. Scofield will speak on "The Coming Glory," followed by Dr. Mark Matthews on "Has God a Program?" the order of events; why the present world conditions are not Armageddon.

"We have built up a progressive, co-ordinated teaching of prophetic study," continued Mr. Adams, "and every speaker has been asked to stick to his text. In the evening the message of the Conference will be applied and we have asked the Rev. Herbert MacKenzie of Cleveland, Ohio, to answer this question 'Does the Truth of the Lord's Return Paralyze or Energize?' Dr. Riley will deliver the crowning address of the Conference on 'What Manner of Christians Ought We to Be?'"

"We believe it will be the greatest Conference of its type ever arranged in this country, and the teachers will have a rare opportunity to arouse the Church of God with this comforting, separating and energizing truth."

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

A WRITER in a recent number of the Epworth Herald asked the young people, "How wide are your prayers?" It is a question well worth considering. You remember the old man who was said to have prayed for "me and my wife, my son John and his wife, us four and no more." Much of our prayer today is of this class. When we enter our closet our vision ranges only to the borders of our personal needs and desires. Our hearts are burdened with the petty things of the immediate present. Our prayers, therefore, are narrow, perhaps selfish, surely of little avail to the world. Let us then burst the bands of self, let us catch the vision of a world redeemed, but without looking past the ignorance, and sin and degradation, the empty hands and longing hearts of the world to be redeemed. Let us pray for missions, perchance, too, for some special mission toward which our heart yearns; let us pray for our nation, for the splendid boys who bear arms today under its flag, for the men of the Red Triangle who minister to their spiritual needs, for the men and women of the Red Cross who ease the pain of wounds or illness, for the President and those in authority, that God may give them his spirit and his leading, that the great questions they must face may be decided according to his will, for the home land that men and women here may serve as loyally as those in khaki "Over There," and for our own town and church, that the power of the Holy Spirit may have free course in both. If thus widely we pray, our souls, cramped by our narrow petitions of the past, will awaken to a new understanding of Him to whom we pray, and our hearts and hands will find new energy for service in the name of Him through whose sacrifice alone we dare to pray.

Mrs. B. T. J. praises God for refreshing rains that fell after a season of drought and "eased this whole country from a terrible financial strain to one of comparative comfort." She asks prayers for the life of a daughter who is soon to pass under an operation, and for the spiritual welfare of her two sons, who are in the army and navy.

"Mother" thanks God for the cure of her son, who was an habitual drunkard, but in trying to quit the whisky habit fell into that of morphine. He is now "clothed and in his right mind," and holds a good position of trust. "Mother" writes this for the encouragement of other mothers.

Prayer is requested for a benevolent institution which for fifty years has been in the care of competent Christian managers, but is now about to pass into the hands of politicians. Many little children come within its walls for training physically, intellectually and spiritually. Let the prayer go up that Christian men and women may still guide those precious interests—that the great institution may not in any way be turned aside from its great and good work.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Dover, N. J.; Protection, Kan.; Toronto, Canada; Portland, Ore. (for a church that has been organized to uplift the fallen); Muskegon, Mich. (for a revival at the First Baptist Church); Mallet Creek, Ohio (for special meetings to be held in August).

H. P. L. prays for God's blessing to rest upon the efforts being put forth to start a United Brethren Church.

Mrs. M. C. H. asks prayer that husband's mind may be restored; Mrs. B. L. B., that a child's mind may be restored; J. S. C., that a mother's mind may be restored; Mrs. J. H. P., that father's mind may be restored; ten friends, for mental restoration for themselves, relatives or friends.

Twenty-one friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including Mrs. E. and Miss O., who ask prayer for rain in West Texas; A Friend, for world-wide peace; D. C., for peace; Mrs. J. R. P., that son may be cured of the tobacco habit.

THE OLD GOSPEL FOR NEW RUSSIA

Did you know that for the first time in a thousand years there is perfect religious liberty in Russia? Will you become a partner in preparing the first party of One Hundred Missionaries now in training at

THE RUSSIAN BIBLE INSTITUTE

1820 SPRING GARDEN STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Pastor Fetler

After imprisonment by the Czar's Government for banishment to Siberia for my Gospel work in Petrograd and Moscow, and later exiled from my dear native land, the Lord has made the wrath of men to praise him by enabling me first to help evangelize the 2,000,000 war prisoners in Europe, and, since September, 1917, to establish the Russian Bible Institute and to organize of which the Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman and the Rev. Prof. W. H. Griffith Thomas are vice-presidents. By all these activities I have been able to accomplish more for the evangelization of Russia in my exile than if I had been allowed to remain unmolested at home. Phil. 1:12.

A hundred resident Russian students have been enrolled for the first year. Will you PRAY that we may have spiritual and material blessing to train these men? Though the population of Russia is almost twice that of the United States, she has not as many preachers as Chicago alone. The greatest need of that unhappy country just now is wise and strong spiritual leaders. Both Jew and Gentile can now be reached freely with the Gospel in that great land. Fifty of these students expect to go to Chicago to be present and to sing at the great Russian Missionary Conference, June 24-28, 1918, at the Moody Tabernacle. I am also praying that we shall be enabled to pay off this year the $35,000 mortgage on the buildings of our Institute. It costs $250 to support a missionary student for one year. Will you, or your Church, Sunday School or Young People's Society adopt one as your representative?

Information and literature may be had from the Secretary, Mr. George L. Leonard, and gifts for the work sent to Mr. G. Percy Fox, Treasurer, 1820 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia.

Yours for Russia's evangelization, WILLIAM FELTER

Pastor Dom Evangelia Church, Petrograd, and President Russian Bible Institute.

The Ministries of Mercy of the Christian Herald Family

IN these days of world-wide war and universal suffering, it is gladdening to know that Christian America is nobly doing its share in relieving the sad condition of those multitudes who have been deprived of their possessions by the war and thrown helpless upon the charity of the world. To the Christian Herald it has been a special source of gratification that its readers have responded so liberally and so faithfully to the many calls upon their benevolence which present conditions have imposed. They have truly vindicated their right to be known as the pioneers in this form of Christian service, for since that day in November, 1914, when the first relief to be sent into Belgium and distributed among the starving population was a cargo of food-stuffs which had been bought with their gifts, they have labored day and night, week in and week out, all of these four years, in the true spirit of consecrated Christian service.

Their benefactions have taken a wide range. They have operated through regularly constituted Christian Herald Relief Committees in fourteen different countries, all of which have been more or less involved in the war. How their gifts have been distributed is shown in the table on the next page.

It must be a gratification to all of the contributors to know that up to the present time every remittance has reached its destination in safety, and not a dollar of their gifts has gone astray. Even when Poland was overrun by contending armies and relief work under the circumstances became an impossibility, the last remittance was returned to New York and, later, applied elsewhere.

America is still doing its duty and will continue to reach out hands full of helpfulness until the great struggle is over and peace returns. We have abundant assurances in the letters received from many of the centers of suffering, that every dollar is finding its mark and that the gifts of our readers, so freely and gladly bestowed, have been greatly blessed in the saving of those who were perishing from hunger and in the clothing of the naked and the sheltering of the homeless and destitute.

Perhaps the saddest spectacle of all is that presented by conditions in Armenia, Syria and Palestine. The ancient Bible lands have assuredly borne a heavy share in the suffering caused by the war. Their people have been mowed down like sheep, not only by the sword, but by disease, hunger and exposure. All up and down through Palestine, the missionaries represent the situation as truly pitiful. Persia is in the grasp of famine, which is aggravated by a great epidemic of typhoid. In Armenia, the country seems to be filled with destitution and beggary.

Prices of foodstuffs—what little stock there is of them—are enormous, and food of any kind is almost unobtainable. A cabled missionary report on May 9 stated that "dogs, dead animals, grass, and even human beings, are eaten" in Persia.

With regard to Palestine, it is hoped that with the arrival of the American Red Cross Commission, conditions will greatly improve and much distress be relieved. The Commission, which was reported to have reached Cairo some time ago, is now due in Jerusalem. Mr. Theodore Waters of the Christian Herald staff is one of the active members of the Commission. It will be recalled by many of our readers that Mr. Waters represented the Christian Herald shortly after the outbreak of the war, and took the first cargo of relief to Belgium. His letters to this journal from the Holy Land may be expected to give a truthful description of actual conditions there, and also a clear idea of the plans for relief, which will be formed on an extensive scale. The coming opportunity to have a part in the restoration of the Christland is one that we believe our readers will welcome, and which they will not fail to appreciate in a very practicable way.

There have been many enterprises in which the Christian Herald Family Circle and their friends have been worthily engaged in the past. They have planted missions in many lands and supported them; they have helped thousands of orphans to a chance to grow up and develop into Christian manhood and womanhood; they have succeeded the suffering, fed the starving, and literally fulfilled the injunction of the Master in applied practical service.

But the calls upon their generosity brought by the great war constitute together an enterprise greater than all that have preceded it. When in God's own good time the battles are ended, the last cannon is silent and the flags furled, it will be a glorious and uplifting memory to recall the fact that every member of the Circle tried to do his or her "bit," and did it to the utmost ability, for the relief of human suffering. The latest cablegram from Jerusalem says: "Our records show twenty thousand individuals helped in Jerusalem. Government now transporting fifteen hundred Armenian refugees Jerusalem to Port Said. Others coming from south-east. Hospital established Mejdal, near Gaza, doing excellent work. Conditions Ramallah region greatly improved. Employment provided for all. Trowbridge will meet Armenian Syrian relief and Red Cross Commission at Port Said."

FOR thirty-three months Poland has borne the brunt of most of the titanic fighting on the Eastern front. A territory as large as Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland, was suddenly transformed into one great battlefield for the tramping millions of the armies of many powers, and today is but a vast cemetery, a dreary desert of devastation, a deep black scar on the face of civilization. More than 200 towns have completely disappeared; 20,000 villages have been leveled to the ground; 1,600 churches are in ruins; 500,000 young Polish girls have had their lives shattered by the greatest tragedy that can come to a woman. The loss in destroyed property amounts to $9,000,000,000, a sum equal to the total wealth of Belgium before the war.

The number of Poles dead from starvation, disease, exposure and cannon since the beginning of the war is appalling. While the rate of army casualties resulting in death on the Western front average 1.1 per cent., in Poland the death rate is 9.8 per cent. In the majority of invaded districts not one child under seven years of age remains alive. Think of it, a country without little children; no babies cooing and laughing in their cradles, no sturdy little ones going to school. One can walk for miles along the dreary waste of grim, silent roads, without meeting a single child.

Out of the twenty million people still remaining alive in Poland eleven

million are homeless, subsisting on the bark of trees, on roots and on the slight help the charity of their own people can give them and the small help from other nations. Some time last year the following proclamation appeared on the walls of Warsaw:

The Government suggests that mothers having children should send them to Germany to be brought up and educated. Mothers who are willing to make this arrangement will receive 150 marks for a boy and 100 marks for a girl. No other aid will be given.

(Signed) Governor Gen. von Beseler.

To render the above proclamation more effective, 100,000 families were immediately expelled from Warsaw to fare the best they could in the open among the ruins of devastated Poland. German charity provides for no one in Poland. Only money can buy food.

Four million dollars has been contributed by the whole world toward the relief of Poland during this war. Of this sum America gave nearly one-half.

Rushing Aid to Bible Lands

The Christian Herald, New York City.

DEAR SIR: It is with great pleasure that I again acknowledge receipt of a check for $10,000 from the Christian Herald for Armenian-Syrian relief. This makes a total of more than $110,000 that your paper has already contributed to this work through our committee in addition to your benefactions through other channels. How urgently this money is needed you can realize from our latest cablegram from Persia, this week, which reads in part:

Great epidemic of typhoid and typhus. Famine conditions unexpectedly growing worse. Dogs, dead animals, grass and even human beings are being eaten.

Another telegram, likewise received within the week from Constantinople, reads in part:

Greatly encouraged that American people are doing so nobly for relief. Much is accomplished, but despite your large appropriations funds are not enough. Our agents are forced to curtail credits to women, many of whom die for lack of nourishing food. Large number in absolute destitution and beggary. Armenians in Damascus district not touched because funds are insufficient.

I beg to assure you that your contribution will at once be put on the cable, and doubtless within a week will be ministering to at least some of the needs suggested above.

C. V. VICKREY,
Secretary American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief,
1 Madison Avenue, New York.

What Are Our Soldier Boys Reading?

YOUR splendid offer to the men of my regiment is gratefully received and it gives me great pleasure to assist in the good work. It will require 1,000 Testaments to finish supplying our men. In reference to the Christian Herald I am sending you a list of the non-commissioned officers of the regiment. If you send a copy to each of these the whole number of men will have the opportunity of reading the paper. This plan puts one copy of the paper in each tent; the tents have five to eight men.

Thus read a letter from Chaplain McCullen of the 120th Infantry. If the Christian Herald Family should make possible a similar scattering of Christian Heralds in all the regiments at home and "over seas" there would be nearly a hundred thousand copies going to France every week, and almost twice as many going to the camps at home. This would in itself almost answer the question of the heading—"What Are Our Soldier Boys Reading?"

A chaplain of a naval vessel in answer to our offer of Testaments and Heralds wrote: "At present I am well supplied with Testaments. I am sending you a list of the names of the men who would like the Christian Herald."

Eleven copies of the paper, which you love so well, now go every week to this busy ship, which is helping to keep the sea clear of the pests in Wilhelmshaven.

With Testaments accumulating, with requests coming in by the hundreds for the Christian Herald, letters were sent to many of the United States Army and Navy chaplains asking further cooperation in the distribution of Testaments.

Since the middle of April many answers have been coming to these letters.

A chaplain of a regiment of Engineers, encamped in the middle west, wrote: "So far as our men at present are concerned we have a full supply of Testaments. We are to have about 700 new men within a few days and I should be glad to have a shipment of Testaments for them. I thank you for your interest in the boys as they are a bright, intelligent and ambitious bunch, these men of the National Army, and it is a great privilege to work with them and for them."

Five hundred Testaments were sent at once to this chaplain, and through him members of the Christian Herald Family were working "with and for" these boys.

Another chaplain wrote: "Your kind and splendid offer received. The Christian Herald is to be commended for its splendid work. In fact, I should have been greatly surprised if the great need of the chaplains along this line of Christian work had been overlooked by your paper."

This chaplain received 500 Testaments. Incidentally he advised the Christian Herald that he could make especially good use of a folding organ and of a motorcycle and side car. It is not the province of the Soldiers and Sailors Fund to provide anything other than Testaments and Christian Heralds, but if any members of the Christian Herald Family desire to have a part in equipping this chaplain with these other necessities, the Christian Herald will be glad to be the medium of their giving.

A chaplain in Massachusetts asked for and received 500 Testaments.

Another in Maryland wrote: "It is very gratifying to know that you are interested in the welfare of the boys who are giving themselves that the nation might vindicate its right to democracy and freedom before the world. It is a great inspiration to these men to know that those who are in civil life are giving their time and money for their comfort. There is much room in my regiment as there is in all of them for the distribution of Testaments. The Y. M. C. A. has been handling the situation very satisfactorily so far, but there is a need right through here, when so many of the men are leaving for "somewhere." They want Testaments. We want to be able to supply them to the utmost." 300 Testaments were sent to this chaplain.

Another chaplain wrote: "Our new draft came in last week, and the Y. M. C. A. supply of Bibles has run short." One thousand Testaments were immediately shipped to Camp Lewis in Washington that the shortage might cease.

In the issue of May 15 we asked you to put the Christian Herald in the hands of the boys. In every camp there is a shortage of reading matter, especially of good current magazines. The boys want it, they are eager for it, it fills in their spare time and gives them needed information, and if the boy is in danger of temptation the hours spent in reading good literature are hours of safety. It is not necessary to tell a Christian Herald audience either of the need of or the value of Testaments. There will never be too many, although as we said in the issue of May 15 the Testament situation is fairly well in hand. We know that the Christian Herald Family will see that sufficient funds are on hand so that no demand upon us for Testaments need be disappointed. We are sure also that you will make possible the sending of Christian Heralds to the thousands of boys who ask for them either directly or through the chaplains. They are our boys; all that we have is back of them; all that they have or had is given for us. Every dollar received will provide three Testaments or will send the Christian Herald for six months to some man in the uniform of the nation.

JUST as we were sending the page to press the editor received this letter:

Dear Christian Herald:
I am temporarily helping out here and have talked to the Secretary in charge asking if 25 to 50 copies a week of the Christian Herald would be acceptable and useful. He says he would be glad to have them.

It occurred to me that an item in your paper asking for money to put your paper in this Camp (and I have no doubt this would be desired in others also) would bring the funds.

George A. Sanford.
Aviation Field No. 2, Hempstead, Long Island, May 12, 1918.

Though there was no money in hand, all these splendid gifts having already been sent on their mission to our boys, the publisher ordered 25 copies sent to Hempstead, knowing that you, good people, would furnish the funds for these and thousands more.

Contributions for Guatemala

FIRST in the field with money for relief, the Christian Herald sent altogether $1,561.87 to the Committee in Guatemala which the churches organized to administer help and assist in reconstruction. Following are additional names of donors to this fund:

"Closer to Nature and the Almighty"

THIS is the philosophy of Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter, the author of "The Harvester," "A Girl of the Limberlost" and other marvelously successful stories—to bring those who read her books "closer to nature and the Almighty." Mrs. Porter has opened the eyes of thousands to the wonder and glory of the world about them. She, who has spent her lifetime with the birds, the moths, the butterflies, the herbs and the flowers, weaves into her stories the love of Nature, and every one of her novels stimulates the reader's interest in the life of the woods and fields.

Mrs. Porter's stories all have, as a fundamental reason of their existence, the author's great love of Nature. To impart this love to others—to inspire many hundreds of thousands to look for the first time with seeing eyes at the pageant of the out-of-doors—is her gift of rare quality.

Through the romance of life and the delights of nature she directs the mind upward toward the Infinite into an atmosphere that is sweet, cleansing and exalting.

In writing of "A Girl of the Limberlost," Mrs. Porter said: "This comes fairly close to my idea of a good book. The book can, and does, present a hundred pictures that will draw any reader in closer touch with nature and the Almighty, my primal object in each line I write."

Over Three Million Copies of Mrs. Porter's Books Have Been Sold

ALL large book circulations come from only one cause—the recommendation of one reader to another. Mrs. Porter's books are wholesome, and there are more good, upright, wholesome people in the United States than any other kind. Mrs. Porter's novels are not only wholesome and clean, but they are romantic and cheerful. The people who live in their pages do things and accomplish tasks worth while, and one's soul is not harrowed by horrors.

Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter's first book, "Freckles," was published some years ago, and sold a few thousand; the next year it sold a few more. The following year her second book, "A Girl of the Limberlost," was published and began to sell. Meantime, "Freckles" went on selling more and more until it sold over 100,000 copies a year. Other books followed, until in the last six months of 1915 the sales of her books in the United States, England, Australia, and many other places sold 625,000 copies for six months alone.

Another reason why Mrs. Porter's books have so great an appeal is that the whole family enjoy them. They are not for men, women, or children, but for all three; and an important feature is that they will be eagerly read by young people, and the nature side cannot but be an inspiration.

Few books of recent years have sounded such a new and wholly refreshing note as that which dominates "Freckles." It has been read, it is estimated, by more than 5,000,000 people.

A Rare Opportunity to Obtain a Special Edition of Mrs. Porter's Novels

IT is the desire of the Christian Herald to give its readers an opportunity to procure the best in literature at very reasonable cost.

Of the many thousands of books which we considered, we have selected Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter's novels as the ones which should be in every Christian Herald home. Arrangements have just been completed with the publishers of Mrs. Porter's works to print a special edition of six volumes of the most popular stories by this talented writer.

These six volumes will be printed from the plates used in the original edition—the type being large and clear, and the paper of exceptional quality. The books are bound in fine cloth, with gilt tops, making them especially attractive.

There are, in addition, twenty-five full-page illustrations by well-known artists.

Gene Stratton-Porter's Novels

At the Foot of the Rainbow

An idyl of central Indiana—a tale of devoted friendship and tender, self-sacrificing love—the friendship that gives freely without return, and the love that seeks first the happiness of the object. The story reaches real heights of endearing sentiment and tender pathos.

Freckles

Few books of recent years have sounded such a new and wholly refreshing note as that which dominates "Freckles," the highly successful novel by Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter. This volume has just been issued in a new and attractively illustrated edition.

A Girl of the Limberlost

This companion story to "Freckles" has repeated the striking success of that book, which, published over ten years ago, has steadily increased its tens of thousands of readers year by year. It is an exquisitely simple love story which stands for true womanhood, as did "Freckles" for pure manhood. It breathes a message of compassion and strength.

The Harvester

Mrs. Porter has lavished upon this unique romance all the wealth of nature lore and nature love from her years of patient, enthusiastic study. It is a charming blend of love, romance and the hidden delights of the woods and roads.

Laddie—A True-Blue Story

The love story of Laddie and Pamela Pryor, the English neighbors of the Strattons, as told by Little Sister, the youngest of the Pryors. A genuine "home-story" close to the heart of Man and of Nature.

Song of the Cardinal

A beautiful and touching story of the love of a Cardinal bird for its mate with an appeal to every one who cares for true romance, as delightful for its descriptions of wild life and nature as for its tender human feelings.

A Week in the World's News

to give them command of the entire coal regions of Russia. The German armies were said to be retreating.

GERMANY'S LOSSES. A German statistician, writing in Das Neue Europa of April 22, estimated the German losses from August 2, 1914, to January 31, 1918, at 4,456,961 men killed in action or taken prisoners. Adding those who died from illness or wounds, the grand total was estimated to exceed 5,000,000 men. Figures given by the British Admiralty reported five German submarines sunk recently in one week, and declared that the average weekly sinkings were showing a constant improvement. Fourteen German submarines were known to have been sunk in April. Great Britain has recently mined thoroughly 22,000 square miles in the North Sea, the mine field extending from the territorial waters of Norway to the coast of Scotland. Two American ships were reported lost on May 16; one of 9,000 tons was torpedoed, one of 7,000 tons was sunk by collision at sea. Both were in army service. There was no loss of life.

BURBANK FINDS SUPER-WHEAT. Luther Burbank announced on May 16 that 11 years of experiment had at last produced a hard winter wheat containing 14 per cent. gluten which would produce a white flour and which could be grown from Hudson Bay to Patagonia.

A $15,000,000,000 ARMY. After his return from France, Secretary Baker reported to the House Committee on Military Affairs estimates for the Army increased by $4,038,753,286. The bill carrying the appropriations for the Army for the fiscal year will provide a total of $11,771,666,847.86, to which will be added about $4,000,000,000 to be carried in the Fortification Bill for heavy artillery, making the entire amount appropriated for the Army in the neighborhood of $15,000,000,000, or about $10,000,000,000 more than for the present fiscal year.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Negotiations were reported on foot, on May 15, for the taking over by the Canadian Government of the Grand Trunk Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. . . . The Federal Grand Jury at Tucson, Ariz., returned indictments against 21 men involved in the exiling of 1186 members of the I. W. W. from Bisbee, Ariz., on July 12, 1917. The indictments charged a conspiracy to deprive a citizen of the United States of his legal rights. . . . From May 1 to 17 American shipyards launched one wooden ship a day, adding 60,000 tons to Uncle Sam's fleet. On May 15 four were sent down the ways. . . . Herbert Hoover, Food Administrator, has sold his big touring-car, releasing his chauffeur for more necessary work, and now drives a small car himself. . . . General Semenoff's Anti-Soviet Army in Siberia, is reported to be growing as he marches westward and to be nearing Lake Baikal. . . . German financial interests are also said to be buying up, at panic prices, stocks in Russian industrial concerns, while many Russians wait anxiously for the Allies to intervene before their country is wholly within the Teuton grasp. . . . Paris dispatches, of May 17, reported plans perfected for immediate intervention by allied armies in Siberia, Japan and China co-operating. . . . Prof. Edward de Valera, president of the Sinn Fein and six other Irish leaders were arrested in Dublin, May 18th, charged with having been in communication with Germany, the arrests nipping in the bud another Irish revolution.

drove them. Southwest of Morlancourt between Albert and the Somme, the Germans attacked British trenches along a front of nearly a mile, being repulsed completely, except at one point, from which they were forced in a counter-attack by Australian troops. On May 13 the Germans were reported as making strenuous preparations for another blow, and as bringing in fresh troops from the Rumanian front. To the British gunfire had been added by recent rains, the handicap of bogs and quagmires.

AMERICAN troops in Picardy on the night of May 13 met and routed a German patrol. American artillery took under its fire, on May 13, a big ammunition dump of the enemy at Cantigny. Two fires were started in Montdidier which were followed by numerous explosions. Three American scouts in the Luneville sector on the same day surprised a party of Germans in a strongly held advance post; killed an officer and four men, captured the officer's documents, and retired as German reinforcements arrived. Twenty-five Americans took up the fight.

MAY 14 saw the German artillery increasing its activity along the whole northern battle front from Lens to Ypres. There were only local actions on the part of the infantry, in which the French advanced their line slightly north of Kemmel village in Flanders on the Picardy front and captured a wood south of Hailles, east of Amiens and west of the Avre River, which they held against a strong counter-attack. The British made a successful raid near Robecq, north of Bethune. The French reported a successful raid north of the Chemin des Dames. The Germans claimed to have penetrated the British lines on the Bray-Corbie road. Allied airmen continued their control of the air, driving down many enemy machines, American pilots maintaining their growing reputation for daring and efficiency.

On May 15, 16 and 17 there were no changes in position although trench raids, especially in Italy, increased and the artillery kept steadily at work.

The total American casualties reported for the five days ending May 18 were: killed in action 50, died of wounds 29, died of disease 21, died by accident or other causes 14, wounded 282, prisoners or missing 100.

Premier Clemenceau's newspaper, published on May 16, the statement that the United States had promised to have 1,500,000 men in France by the end of 1918. The War Department at Washington did not confirm this promise, although Secretary Baker told the Senate Military Committee some weeks ago that he had hopes of getting that many men in France before the end of the year.

Gen. Pershing began on May 15 the sending of regular daily reports on the activities of troops under his command. The first day's reports, covering only the troops north of Toul and in the Lorraine sector, chronicled artillery and raiding activity and successful work in the air. Three German machines were brought down by two of our aviators. The report also completed the story of the patrol fight in the Lorraine sector. Of the three men who began it, only two returned at first. The 25 who went out to continue the fighting and to search for the missing man, penetrated to the strong point attacked by the first patrol, but were driven back by rifle and grenade fire, returning to their trenches less one man missing. Two officers went out to seek this man. Although they did not find him they killed an enemy scout, bringing back the body with them for identification purposes. The third man of the first party finally returned.

Italian naval and air forces co-operated in an attack on the Austrian naval base at Pola, early Tuesday morning, May 14, when one torpedo boat succeeded in threading the narrow 2-mile channel, eluding search lights and sentinels, and torpedoed an Austrian dreadnought of 20,000 tons lying in the harbor. Italian seaplanes brought down two Austrian battle planes defending the port without loss to themselves. An Italian torpedo boat on the night of May 12 sunk an Austrian transport near the port of Durazzo.

With all the resources of the government libraries and departments and of the public museums and their staffs and with the active assistance of national experts this Information Bureau is ready to tell you the answer to

Whatever You Want to Know

The bureau is prepared to answer fully and promptly questions regarding food production and conservation, transportation, industrial activities, history, patents and inventions, pensions and Army insurance, legislation, exploration and discovery, government employment, and all of the thousand and one things that you want to be sure of.

Inquiries must be accompanied by a stamp to cover postage on the reply. Answers to questions of general interest will be published in this page. Watch this page for special offers of helpful material.

Questions and Answers

E. M. Phoenix, Ariz. It is unfortunately true that many who hear the Gospel give no heed to its teachings. The seed falls upon stony ground and never has a chance to take root. This applies equally to the heathen and the civilized. Still, the duty remains to us to keep on with our Gospel ministry wherever it is needed, and with the spread of the Bible, for the Word itself, even without other aids, possesses power to reach the heart and transform the life. The Scriptures and many other good books besides are translated and circulated among the races you mention. We agree with your conviction that it would be a happy result if the nations "could get a clear vision of the life of Christ, that through the love of Jesus and a Christian life, people and nations might become friends, working in harmony for the uplifting of mankind and drawing all nations closer to God."

E. H., Buffalo, N. Y. 1. The priesthood of Melchizedek was of divine appointment. In Ps. 110:4, which is of a distinctly Messianic character, the reference to the Messiah's priesthood "after the order of Melchizedek" is very clear, and we find it again referred to in Heb. 7:3. This order is one which supersedes that of Aaron or Levi, and it was so recognized by Abraham (Gen. 14:20) in paying him tithes. In a tablet found at Tel el-Amarna, there is a letter from Ehed-tob, King of Uru-Salim (Jerusalem) who states that he did not receive the crown of inheritance but from God, and being a priest-king, he claimed to exercise his priestly office by divine right. 2. Works of necessity and mercy are not a violation of the spirit of the Lord's Day.

W. E. V., Big Sandy, Mont. We have no knowledge of dream lore and no skill in its interpretation.

Mrs. J. M. K., Lipscomb, Tex. 1. Religious controversies, and especially wrangles over denominational matters, are apt to beget bitter feelings and should be avoided. 2. "Everlasting" is a term which is sometimes used in different senses. According to the best authorities, it would occasionally be better rendered as "age-lasting," or "long-enduring," as for instance when it is applied to natural objects, mountains, etc. 3. The "second death" (see Rev. 21:8) implies a condition beyond all hope of restoration or reclamation, involving entire separation from God. Spiritual death may begin even in this life. As one commentator writes, in such a case "the whole man goes away forever from the glory and joy of God's presence." 4. There is no passage in the Bible which excludes a repentant soul from the divine pardon. The wilful sinner—one who, knowing the nature and penalty of sin, deliberately commits sin—is in deadly peril of condemnation, unless he repents and turns to God. His own delay in doing so may cause him to be lost; yet we have the assurance that even the worst of sinners will find forgiveness, if he renounce his sin and come to the mercy seat in the spirit of contrition and repentance.

Mrs. H. G. S., Auburn, N. Y. During this terrible war, with all its horrors, somehow the Armenians have appealed to me most because they are Christians, and it is so hard to understand why God does not protect them. For years our King's Daughters have sent money to help, and both our Circle and the Juniors have just sent $5 apiece more—a drop in this hour of need. I have prayed every night that whatever good came out of this war, the Turks might be driven out of Europe and Armenia forever freed from them. I wondered if with all the influence such a paper as yours must have, you could not some way reach the President and have Armenia protected before we have peace.

In recent addresses, the President has made an earnest plea for the rights of small nations to be respected. This must include Armenia, and it is our hope that there may yet be better days in store for that unfortunate people, and that there may be an end to their terrible sufferings.

A. M. Birtle, Man., sends this practical suggestion: "Some weeks ago there appeared the published account of an Ohio schoolgirl having lost her eyesight by holding her nose while sneezing. If she had understood how simple it is to have a good sneeze without noise, or holding the nose, her distressing blindness would never have occurred, and her sneezing would not have disturbed her nearest fellow pupil. It is just this: When the tickling in the nose preliminary to sneezing has fully set in, fill the lungs full of air. This hold till the sneeze is over, and there will be no outward explosion or noise. There will be just a little extra expansion of the lungs that produces a good effect."

C. E. S., Martinsville, Ohio. The laurel wreath was first used to form a crown or wreath of honor for poets and heroes in ancient Greece. The title poet laureate was first used in England for the office of the poet attached to the royal household and was first held by Ben Jonson for whom the position was created by Charles I in 1617. He was succeeded by Sir William Davenant in 1660, followed by Dryden in 1670. Since that time the office has been held by T. Shadwell, Nahum Tate, Nicholas Rowe, Lawrence Eusden, Colley Cibber, William

AT THE WATERING-TROUGH By Margaret E. Sangster

The horses watered here in summer weather,
When all the earth was calm and warm and still;
We watched them from the farm, we watched together...
Now it is winter-time, and cold, and still,
And all alone I stand, and I am lonely,
The very horses come to drink no more—
There sounds no voice to ease my heart-ache, only
The shrill winds rattle through each hingeless door.

I stand alone, and dream the sun is shining,
Upon the golden crops of healthy grain;
I try to tell myself to cease repining,
To tell myself that peace will come again—
And yet, my soul is weary, and my eyes
Can find no solace in the angry skies.

H. J. N. Linden, N. Y. The first steam carriage was proposed by Sir Isaac Newton in 1688. In 1790 a patent for a similar vehicle was taken out by Nathan Read. However, the first practical experiments were made by Nicholas Joseph Cugnot in 1769-70. There have been many experiments in airplanes. The first man to make a substantial contribution to the science of aviation was Sir George Cayley, an Englishman, in 1809. He was followed by Sir Hiram Maxim in England and Professor S. P. F. E. M., La Harpe, Kan. 1. In Mark 8:14-22, Christ uses the apostles' carelessness in taking bread and their fear lest they hunger as a starting-point for one of his wonderful lessons, and adopts the picture of the homely leaven suggested by the want of bread. He warns them against the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod. The leaven of the Pharisees is hypocrisy; that of the Sadducees was hypocritical liberalism. 2. The words of John 2:4 addressed by Jesus to his mother do not convey an expression of disrespect and harshness, as might be implied from the English translation. This use of the Greek word for "woman" is consistent with the utmost respect. The Lord does give his mother a mild reproof, to the effect that the relation of mother, however precious in its own sphere, cannot be allowed to enter into that in which Jesus now stands. 3. The answer of Jesus to his mother plainly implied that his hour would come. Mary, therefore, fully believing in him, tells the servants to be ready to serve him when that time came.

Mrs. E. M. M., Titusville, Pa., writes: "In 1827 my father read Lyman Beecher's Six Lectures on Intemperance. He was a dry goods merchant in the little town of Ludlowville, Tompkins County, New York. Like all the merchants in the country, he sold whisky, but he never drank it. After reading the lectures he was so impressed with the evil that he poured the whisky he had in the store into the street, and thereafter gave all the time he could spare from his business to lecturing on temperance and to Sunday school work. This he always did at his own expense, and never but once had received anything. Once a gentleman gave him $5. He claimed as one of 'his boys' Dr. Theodore Cuyler who wrote of him after he had gone that he was an 'imperfect copy of the Lord Jesus Christ but written in large hand.' In his memory I am sending the enclosed $5 to be used in the Bowery Mission work." Our friend's letter and her memorial gift are in themselves an excellent argument for temperance.

J. S. P. The world has changed greatly since Paul's time, and woman's sphere, her influence and usefulness, are very different today. In Paul's time, and even later, many women, being uneducated, were the victims of false teachers and were easily duped. Now women are as carefully educated as men, have many of the same opportunities for advancement, and have taken so active a part in the activities of life, that to deny them the right of representation would not only be foolish but wrong. If you will compare I Tim. 2:10 and 1 Cor. 14:34, you will realize that Paul on the woman question was dealing strictly with local and timely circumstances.

Nation Responds Nobly to Call of the Red Cross

THE nation took up the cause of the Second War Fund of the American Red Cross with an enthusiasm that augured well for over-subscription of the $100,000,000 sought; New York City reporting on the first day gifts of about $4,500,000 toward its quota of $25,000,000.

With organization perfected to the last township, and people everywhere crowding forward with their gifts or waiting expectantly, even impatiently, for the call of the committeeman; with 22,000,000 members all active in its work of mercy, each ready to inform another of the multiplied service of the Red Cross at home and abroad, the campaign started with a momentum like that of soldiers charging over the top. By noon of the second day more than a fourth of the whole had been subscribed throughout the union.

Without giving figures in detail, five claims were filed at Washington for the honor of being the first units to meet their requirements. South Dakota oversubscribed its allotment of $250,000 by 70 per cent. on the first day. Michigan and Delaware also went over the top at the first dash. Governor Pinkham of Hawaii said the territory had oversubscribed its quota of $250,000. Peabody, Mass.; Kossuth County, Iowa; Pontotoc County, Okla.; and Yolo County, Calif.—all reported that they had passed 100 per cent. on the first day of the drive.

THE largest subscription announced was one for $2,000,000 by the United States Steel Corporation.

E. H. Gary, chairman of the board, told the workers that this appropriation had been made after the corporation had received from its general counsel "an opinion that corporations may contribute direct to the Red Cross Fund." He added that "from information received it is believed that the steel corporations of the country generally will furnish proportionate amounts."

The largest personal subscription was one of $1,000,000 from George F. Baker. Cleveland H. Dodge gave $500,000. J. P. Morgan & Co. contributed $500,000, and the Standard Oil Company the same. The Utah Copper Co. and Phelps, Dodge & Co. each gave $250,000. Other large contributors were Henry Clay Frick, $250,000; Payne Whitney, $250,000; Kuhn, Loeb & Co., $125,000; Charles Hayden, $100,000; Mrs. William D. Straight and Mrs. Russell Sage, $75,000.

ENTHUSIASTIC reports of the early progress of the Red Cross campaign were received at national headquarters at Washington. Messages telling of oversubscriptions in towns and counties from New England to Hawaii began to arrive early, while governors of almost all the states telegraphed promises of hearty cooperation in the auctioning of packages of wool clipped from the White House sheep.

"Every dollar contributed will help the boys who are going over there to shear the Kaiser's goat," telegraphed Governor Catts of Florida.

Governor Boyle of Nevada wired: "State that realized $275,000 by sale of Gridley sack of flour for the sanitary commission in the Civil War has not forgotten how to bid for liberty."

Justin Godart of the French High Commission said: "I have seen our wounded dressed, our old people encouraged, our women strengthened, our children nursed and cuddled, our homesteads rebuilt. What the American Red Cross has achieved is immense. It must be continued."

The British Red Cross, through Sir Arthur Stanley, the chairman, sent a message of greeting which said: "The British Red Cross Society, on the eve of the American Red Cross drive, cordially wishes you success in your great appeal. Your splendid work speaks for itself in every war zone and your civilian relief work has brought fresh heart to those of our Allies whose countries have suffered so severely from the devastation of war. Good luck and godspeed, and may your fresh efforts beat even the wonderful record that you achieved last year."

THROUGHOUT Greater New York the campaign opened with much picturesque detail. In Brooklyn girls sold flowers for the cause at the principal "L" stations, and in the streets ninety colliers carried Red Cross saddlebags into which contributions might be dropped.

Coney Island, whose merchants and showmen gave 10 per cent. of all their receipts for the week—a total of $40,000 to $50,000—started with a military carnival. Taking part in it were 100 sailors from the rendezvous at Fifty-second Street, Brooklyn, and thirty-nine policemen now attached to the Port Guard.

At the booths throughout the city the campaign was opened with meetings. In City Hall Park, where the Mayor's Committee of Women on National Defense has kept its Liberty Bell, President Smith of the Aldermen opened the meeting, and the wife and daughter of Mayor Hylan were among those who pinned buttons on donors.

Huge Red Crosses began to keep tally of totals in Broadway and in Fifth Avenue. In Broadway a twelve-foot emblem was moved from Houston Street one block for every $1,000,000. In Fifth Avenue the emblem stood at Eighth Street until $8,000,000 had been raised. Then it was moved forward by sailors one block for each additional $1,000,000, so that the number of the street at which it stood told the aggregate. On May 24 it was at Sixty-third street.

ALTHOUGH the success of the campaign was early assured, workers did not let up, as it was hoped to roll up an oversubscription. The necessity for those chapters, towns and States which had oversubscribed to continue their efforts was emphasized in a statement sent to War Fund managers by Henry P. Davison, chairman of the Red Cross War Council.

Mr. Davison called attention to the fact that the arrangements for the campaign were made early in the year, before the recent German drives in Picardy and Flanders, and that changed conditions called for increased Red Cross funds. For that reason he asked all workers not to lessen their efforts to obtain subscriptions until the close of the campaign.

THE way in which the American Red Cross, aided by the Army Medical Corps in France, succeeded in discovering the cause of the widespread transmission of trench fever and is therefore now able to take steps to defeat a malady which had baffled the medical men of England and France, has been described by Dr. Alexander Lambert, president of the New York State Medical Society. Incredible as it may seem, the disease, which has seriously crippled great numbers of British and French troops, and which it was feared might attack American troops in the future, was found to have been carried by body lice, the "cooties" of the trenches. The exhaustive experiments, terminating in success, which established this fact, are hailed as a new triumph for American medical science.

The latest feat of the American Red Cross workers in France is going into the first line trenches, serving coffee and chocolate to the American soldiers about to leave for their patrol in No Man's Land, and greeting the men upon their return with fresh supplies of coffee, chocolate and dry socks.

SOME idea of the activities of the American Red Cross in France may be gained from its report to the French Department of Civil Affairs for April. It has a staff of 97 physicians, 164 nurses, and 334 men and 606 women attendants, and is carrying out regular work in 119 cities and villages in France.

There are fourteen civilian hospitals, with a capacity of 1,364 beds. Forty-seven dispensaries give medical care to children, tubercular patients and refugees. The organization has 78 delegates distributing relief to refugees in 58 departments in France. In Paris 30,000 school children get supplementary school lunches from the Red Cross.

During the month 119 workers were added to the staff, 19,424 persons received medical care (a gain of 2,463 over March); 9,317 refugees were housed, and 9,594 were given employment. The total number of civilians reached during the month was 327,213, of whom 243,846 were children, 6,553 tubercular patients, 73,361 refugees and refugee children, and 3,447 were French war cripples. The increase in persons reached over March was 15,896.

The money donations to outside organizations in April totaled 633,159 francs, of which 83,933 francs were devoted to people suffering from tuberculosis, 37,764 to refugees, 10,000 to reconstruction and relief in the devastated area, 155,451 to children, and 5,911 to incapacitated wounded.

A large number of garments and shoes were given away during April. Furniture, household utensils, bedding, linen, cloth, food and coal are distributed by all the Red Cross bureaus.

DR. WILLIAM P. LUCAS, who has been in charge of infant welfare work of the American Red Cross in France for the past six months, and who has just returned to this country, says of the work there, which has touched more than 150,000 children:

"The simple part and most interesting part of the work that I have had to do with has been with the women and the children of France. We landed in France on August 11. In three days from that time we were in Toul starting one of our biggest and most interesting pieces of work. We were helping the prefect of that department in his children's work. We have now, outside of Toul, which has since then become one of our big American army centers, a hospital of 200 beds for women and children.

"With the co-operation and under the wing of the French government, we have had charge of all the children that come through Evian. Dr. Gelston has examined over 28,000 children in six months. We have there a hospital of 200 beds. It has been one of the sieves that has kept contagion from getting into France.

"In America there is one physician to every 500 people; in France there is but one physician to 5,000 people, and I know of communities where there is but one to 20,000 people. In the cities it is, every day, hard work, with nothing spectacular to it. The doctors are busy in dispensaries, in hospitals, in traveling dispensaries. We are doing all sorts of work. We are aiding different French societies—several hundred of them—to whom we are giving financial aid. One of the biggest sections of our work has to do with direct aid to these French organizations."

THE War Council has appropriated the sum of $100,000 to be expended by the Department of Military Relief in defraying all expenses incident to the establishment and maintenance of the Red Cross Institute for Re-educating the Blind Soldiers. The work of the Institute will be carried out in close co-operation with the general plans of the Army and Navy for the rehabilitation of blind soldiers and sailors.

An American mission which has been sent to assist the Serbians has arrived at Corfu on the way to Salonica. It is headed by Major Francis Jager of the Red Cross.

The Wellesley College unit, which has just arrived in France, has been assigned to work in the Lyons district. This is the second group of college women to undertake work in France, the first being the Smith College girls.

The World Fight for Fertilizer

American Chemists Answer Kaiser's Threat with New Processes for Potash—By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

HAS the mailed fist of the Kaiser a grip on the throat of the American farmer? The Germans think so. They believe that their potash mines are the key to the food supply of the world and that when the war is over they can dictate which of the nations shall have plenty of food and which will go starving. Dr. Wilhelm Ostwald of the University of Leipzig and one of the Kaiser's privy counselors, recently warned the United States that America had gone into this war like a man with a rope about his neck. He said that rope was the potash in the hands of the Kaiser, and that it would surely be tightened after peace came.

This threat might have created some consternation four years ago. At the time the war broke out Germany had mines which were supposed to be the only cheap supply of potash on earth. She had a monopoly of the world's potash, and she kept one-half of all that she mined for her own farmers. We took more than half of the balance, and our imports amounted to several hundred thousand tons of pure potash a year. We bought more than a million tons of the raw material as it came from the mines, and this annually cost our farmers about $20,000,000.

AS soon as war was declared the prices rose to the clouds. In 1914 muriate of potash was selling for $39 a ton. It doubled and quadrupled in value, and by December, 1915, it was $500 per ton. Then Uncle Sam began to sit up and take notice. He had had his chemical and mining experts at work before the war began. He now added to the force, and since then we have been taking potash out of certain salt lakes of our western deserts, out of the flue dust of our cement mills and blast furnaces, and from the seaweed which grows in great quantities in the waters off the California coast. The government is investigating certain rocks of the United States which are rich in potash, and the green sands along the coastal plain of the Atlantic which contain the same salt. In short, the results of our investigations are such that we expect to be able to make ourselves independent of other nations as far as potash is concerned for all time to come.

The agricultural experts tell me that potash is a great source of our food supply. It stimulates the plants; it contributes to the strength of the stalks and fills out the kernels of our cereals. We have to use large quantities of it for our potatoes and other truck crops; we use it for cotton, tobacco and oranges and also for peaches and all kinds of fruit crops. Just now the great demand for it is in the southern and eastern parts of the country.

THIS valuable stuff is an element which is scattered through almost everything all over the earth, but usually in such small quantities and in such combinations that it is not possible to get it out at a profit. Potash is found in the soil and in certain rocks. There is more of it in the crust of the earth than there is water upon the earth. It is found in seawater. The seaweed grabs the potash into itself to such an extent that some kinds of dried kelp have 500 pounds of pure potash to the ton.

Germany has the only big potash mines upon earth. They are situated in Prussia, and the best of them are under a town named Stassfurt on the Bode River, a branch of the Elbe, hundreds of miles from where they are fighting in France. The mines were discovered about sixty years ago. The daily output is 36,000 tons.

And now let me show you what we are doing to create a potash supply of our own. We had none when the war broke out. We began to produce in 1916 and during the first six months of last year we made more potash than in the entire year preceding. The amount produced in 1917 was about one-tenth of what we were importing from Germany before the war began, and the production from every principal source is rapidly increasing.

AWAY out in the Mojave desert of California is Searles Lake, where a company of capitalists has already invested more than two and one-half million dollars to get out the potash which lies in the brine under a bed of mud and crystalline salt. They have put up an evaporator house made of steel which is more than one hundred feet high, has boilers of 2,000 horse-power, and a concrete chimney which is about one-third as tall as the Washington Monument and nine feet in diameter at the top. Searles Lake has millions of tons of potash. The lake covers an area of almost 8,000 acres, and its depth is not known. The top is all salt and mud, but under this covering is a brine whose solids are about seven per cent. potash. They will soon be reducing this brine at the rate of 20,000,000 gallons a day, and from that the potash output will be in the neighborhood of 500 tons. The chief trouble is the large percentage of other salts which are mixed with the potash. These must be refined. This is to be done at San Pedro, not far from Los Angeles. Future additions to the works will probably increase the total investment to more than $4,000,000.

At Owens Lake, California, they are preparing to get out potash by a new method, without the employment of artificial heat. This lake has water as bitter as that of the Dead Sea. It contains salt, soda, borax and other salines in solution. It is estimated to hold about 3,000,000 tons of potash, and a large part of this will be gotten out by evaporating the water in vats by the heat of the sun. The lake has an area of 100 square miles and it is about thirty feet deep.

THERE are salt lakes in the sandhills of northwestern Nebraska in which the potash from the great prairie and forest fires of the past are supposed to have drained. The largest of these is Jesse Lake, which covers about 240 acres. There are several companies working in Nebraska, and they are now producing a large part of our potash supply.

We expect to get potash out of the Great Salt Lake. One company is already erecting a plant there and another of large capital is expected to do likewise.

The potash in the Pacific Ocean Uncle Sam proposes to gather by means of a seaweed that grows wild in the ocean. It is the largest plant known, and it sometimes runs 100 feet from where it attaches itself to a rock by a root or holdfast. It goes from this anchorage in a flexible hollow stem, which is much like a long stick of macaroni, to the high-tide surface of the ocean and there develops into a float the shape and size of a small, empty watermelon. From this float gigantic leaves spread out over the water in every direction, covering the surface like a field of pond lilies and sometimes impeding navigation. This plant is known as kelp. It feeds upon the water and absorbs the potash. When the plants are taken out and dried about one-fourth of their contents is chloride of potash.

The Department of Agriculture has surveyed several hundred square miles of these kelp fields off the coast of California and the Bureau of Soils has erected an experimental plant at Summerland, to determine the best methods of harvesting the kelp and extracting the potash. Big dredges load the kelp on barges to be towed to the factories.

THE story of the potash we are getting as a by-product from our cement mills and iron ore furnaces is most gratifying. In fact, it is so encouraging that the experts believe that if all our cement mills were equipped with by-product plants they could annually save more than 80,000 tons of potash, and that, with a slight change of operation, this amount might be so increased that it would equal one-half of the supply we have been importing from Germany. This potash would come from the flue dust which has been floating away on the air from the chimneys of the cement mills, poisoning much of the vegetation about. It comes from materials that in most mills are still going to waste and whose saving would greatly better the conditions nearby. An overplus of potash kills as readily as the right quantity stimulates.

Since the war the Cottrell process has been applied also to saving the potash in the flue dust from the iron blast furnaces. The Bethlehem Steel Company was the first to experiment as to this saving. It has found that it could get $30,000 per annum from the potash from one furnace and that the saving from its twenty-five furnaces would equal $750,000 a year.

It is estimated that ten pounds of potash can be saved from every ton of iron that comes from the furnaces. If this is correct, the 25,000,000 tons we annually smelt would mean a saving of 250,000,000 pounds or 125,000 tons of potash, which added to the 100,000 tons that might be had from our cement mills would make us practically independent of Germany. This is by the saving only of what until now has floated away on the air. I am told that even at the normal prices of potash this could be done at a profit.

America Third on the Battlefront

FOR weeks we have known that the boys were going "over there" by the thousands, last furloughs, last letters home before sailing, speeding troop trains and deep laden ships all told one story. We were pretty well prepared therefore for the announcement from Washington, on May 21, that America's first Field Army was in service in France, and that it numbered some 200,000 seasoned troops, and consisted of two army corps, each made up of one Regular Army division, one National Army division, and one National Guard division. This first Field Army is under the temporary command of Major-General Hunter Liggett, and one of the army corps is reported to be under the command of Major-General Charles T. Menoher. It was expected that the officers chosen for the permanent command of the field armies would be given the rank of Lieutenant-General. It was announced that further field armies would be formed as fast as the number of men in France would permit it, and that in the meantime the brigading of American troops with the French and British would continue. Earlier reports had already told of a large body of National Army troops brigaded with British reserve troops back of the line in Flanders, where they were getting their final training shoulder to shoulder with British veterans, who were enthusiastic over the aptness and intense earnestness of the Americans.

General Pershing's bulletins for the week showed more than usual activity in raids on the part of the Americans, and chronicled the loss of America's premier flying ace, Major Raoul Lufbery, on May 18. Hostile raids were repulsed in Picardy and in Lorraine, the enemy losing killed and wounded. American airmen continued their successful combats with their German enemies.

On May 19, stung by the score of losses, which stood 10 to 2 in favor of the Americans, the Germans sent over the American lines a great armored biplane with two engines, a pilot and two gunners. The pilot was protected by a steel house. The gunners were in armor. The big swift "flying tank," as it was called, was attacked by six American pilots, who sent streams of bullets in vain against the 36-inch armor of the German, who was apparently inconvenienced not the least bit by the storm of lead directed at him. One of the Americans, landing out of ammunition, reported his inability to damage the German machine. Major Lufbery asked permission to try. He got above the German and swept down head first at the monster plane, then swerved off, apparently because his machine-gun had jammed. In a few moments he returned to the attack, dashing by with his machine-gun going. As he turned and started again toward the enemy his machine was seen to swerve and a thin line of flame shot from it. It hung still in the air for a moment, and then started to fall from an altitude of about 2,000 meters. When the machine had fallen some 500 meters, Lufbery was seen to rise and leap into midair. His body fell in the midst of a flower garden back of a residence in a little village, and his machine fell in flames a quarter of a mile away. The only wound on the aviator's body was a bullet hole through the right hand, apparently made by the incendiary bullet which set fire to the petrol tank of his machine. The American flyers all reported their machine-guns useless against the new German plane, but they took revenge on an observation plane which they drove down back of the American lines. Later in the day French flyers brought down the big German a few miles from the scene of Lufbery's fatal flight. One French pilot gave his life in a vain attack upon the big armored plane, but another succeeded in sending a lucky bullet through the steel armor of the pilot house. The machine fell back of the Allied lines, but the three men of its crew were dead. It was found that the plane carried six machine-guns.

The casualties reported by General Pershing for the week including May 25 are as follows: killed in action 38, died of wounds 32, died of disease 39, died of accidents or other causes 14, wounded 217, and missing or prisoners 21.

Representative Campbell, on May 22, placed before the House of Representatives figures authorized by the Secretary of War which showed that America now had not only more than 500,000 men in France, 90,000 sailing in the first ten days of May, but 1,000,000 more ready to go and a total of 2,078,223 officers and men under arms. Representative Campbell stated that the strength of the army could be raised to 5,000,000 in a year without taking men outside of Class 1 of the draft. He estimated the maximum man power of the Central Powers at 18,360,000 men and of the Allies at 68,879,500. It was also known, on May 22, that America now stood third in length of front held in France, the Allies standing in order, France, England, America and Belgium.

American gunners early on May 21 swathed in gas shells the German positions in Gerechamp Wood northwest of Toul. It is also announced that American chemists have prepared some gases for the Germans to try which are the deadliest yet used in warfare.

The Military Affairs Committee of the House, on May 23, on recommendation of Secretary Baker incorporated in Army Bill a provision authorizing the President to draft in each fiscal year, as many men as can be equipped, trained and used. This will remove all restrictions on the size of our army which can now be made big enough for the job ahead of it.

Secretary Baker, addressing on May 24 at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York a meeting in celebration of the third anniversary of the Italian entrance into the war, brought the audience to its feet by declaring that our men would soon be fighting with the Italians.

Premier Lloyd George, of Britain, speaking in Edinburgh on May 24, declared that the war was now a race between Von Hindenburg and President Wilson, Germany straining every nerve to strike a decisive blow before the American armies could be brought into the field. The Premier also stated that America's help had not yet replaced one-fifth of the shortage due to the loss of Russia as an ally, but he did not make it clear whether he meant that the Americans on the fighting front were less than one-fifth of the Germans brought from Russia to the West, or whether he had some other basis of calculation. He declared the greatest battle of the war was at hand, and expressed the utmost confidence regarding the result.

The British armed merchant ship Moldavia, 9,500 tons, transporting American troops from Britain to France, was torpedoed, on May 23, and sunk; fifty-six American soldiers being unaccounted for at last reports. The scene of the torpedoing was not made public, although it was inferred that the Moldavia was crossing the channel. She was hit amidships, and was able to keep on her course for some time after being struck. When it was seen that she could not be kept afloat long enough to make port, the escorting destroyers took off her crew and passengers. The men saved lost all their belongings; those lost were believed to have been killed by the explosion of the torpedo or to have been trapped on the lower deck by the rushing water. A survivor told a New York Times correspondent: "If you print anything about us, just tell the old folks at home that we are sure full of fight and will book this to Old Fritz as a debt we will sure pay soon."

MCADOO REORGANIZES RAILROADS. It was announced, on May 19, that the government would make available to the American railroads nearly a billion dollars during 1918, of which $440,071,000 would be spent for additions and betterments, $479,686,531 for equipment, and $18,203,774 for track extensions. On the 21st an order was issued removing all railroad presidents from active conduct of the various systems. It was said that some of these executives had failed to cooperate with the Railroad Administration. In place of these presidents, Federal Managers were to be appointed, who it was understood would not receive more than $20,000 a year.

WASHINGTON WOULD RESTORE RUSSIA. It was announced from Washington, on May 19, that those best qualified to judge the conditions of the Russian situation were constantly becoming more certain that the present situation presented an opportunity for action that would bring Russia back as a potent factor on the side of the Allies. It was suggested that military aid to the Bolshevik government would be playing into Germany's hands and that a civil commission with strong military support, supplied principally by Japan, could move westward across Siberia, organizing and giving sufficient support to local governments as it progressed. It was felt that such a movement, sincerely carried out, would soon be recognized as a friendly action by the majority of Russians, and that it would be cumulative and would rapidly gain momentum which would eventually carry it across the Urals and bring the Germans to a sudden halt in their orgy of military penetration into a country with which they are nominally at peace. Petrograd in the meantime was reported to be practically facing starvation, while much of Russia was in the same condition. Anarchy was developing rapidly under the Bolshevik government, which, however, on May 12, sent a delegation to Kiev to enter into peace negotiations with the Ukraine.

In the meantime there appeared to be somewhat of a disagreement between China and Japan over the negotiations for their joint participation in Siberia. Japan was reported to have demanded of China that Chinese troops operate under Japanese officers; that arms and other war materials be interchangeable and that the railway zones be entirely under Japanese control, Japan agreeing to give financial assistance where needed for military purposes, to establish fortifications, and to police the zone effectively. Some sort of an agreement along this line had apparently been signed at this writing.

Siberia was reported as ready to organize an independent and anti-German government if assured of Allied military protection.

800,000 NEW SOLDIERS. President Wilson, on May 20, signed the new Selective Draft Bill at the same time designating June 5 as the day when all young men who had reached the age of 21 years since June 5, 1917, should register for military service. The registration was placed under the direction of the Exemption Boards. It was expected that more than 800,000 would thus become eligible for military service, of whom the majority would fall in Class 1; although it was announced that all of the present Class 1 would be placed in service before any of the new registrants were called upon.

The Provost Marshal's office announced that every registered man must either work or fight, and the work must be useful work or work in which a woman cannot be equally efficient. Gamblers, fortune tellers, waiters, passenger elevator operators, footmen, club attendants, and attendants and players in games and amusements, ushers, persons in domestic service and clerks in stores and mercantile establishments are listed as liable to be called into the army regardless of classification otherwise.

SHIPS VS. U-BOATS. In the week ending May 18, the shipyards of the United States delivered 10 steel ships aggregating 58,650 tons, and launched 2 steel and 12 wooden hulls of a total capacity of 55,200 tons. The Ship Board is planning for July 4 a unique celebration which shall consist of the putting into

The Conference on Prophecy

AS this issue of the Christian Herald is being printed, the Bible Conference on Prophecy will be in session in Philadelphia. The speakers are men of proven scholarship, eloquent, reverent and practical, and the Conference will, without doubt, set a new mark forward in the study of divine revelation as it relates to man's affairs. Next week's Herald will bring you a complete report of the Conference, its spirit, its personalities, and its addresses. See complete announcement on page 714.

President Wilson Declares Germany Insincere

IT was generally expected that Mr. Balfour's answer in the Commons, on May 16, to the persistent pacifists of Britain would be followed by some expression from President Wilson, who is looked upon now in all quarters as the spokesman of the Allied cause. On May 18, at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City, the President, in opening the Red Cross drive, laid for good, it is devoutly to be hoped, the ghost of peace by agreement with the Central Powers, until such time as the ghost shall be replaced by some solid substance of honorable purpose.

The President's address was, in part, as follows:

"I AM not come here tonight to review for you the work of the Red Cross. . . . I have come here simply to say a few words to you as to what it all seems to me to mean, and it means a great deal.

"There are two duties with which we are face to face. The first duty is to win the war. And the second duty, that goes hand in hand with it, is to win it greatly and worthily, showing the real quality of our power not only, but the real quality of our purpose and of ourselves. Of course, the first duty, the duty that we must keep in the foreground of our thought until it is accomplished is to win the war. I have heard gentlemen recently say that we must get five million men ready. Why limit it to five million?

"I have asked the Congress of the United States to name no limit because the Congress intends, I am sure, as we all intend, that every ship that can carry men or supplies shall go laden upon every voyage with every man and every supply she can carry. And we are not to be diverted from the grim purpose of winning the war by any insincere approaches upon the subject of peace. I can say with a clear conscience that I have tested those imitations, and have found them insincere. I now recognize them for what they are, an opportunity to have a free hand, particularly in the East, to carry out purposes of conquest and exploitation.

"Every proposal with regard to accommodations to the west involves a reservation with regard to the east. Now, so far as I am concerned, I intend to stand by Russia as well as France. The helpless and the friendless are the very ones that need friends and succor, and if any in Germany think we are going to sacrifice anybody for our own sake, I tell them now they are mistaken. For the glory of this war, my fellow-citizens, so far as we are concerned, is that it is, perhaps for the first time in history, an unselfish war. I could not be proud to fight for a selfish purpose, but I can be proud to fight for mankind. If they wish peace let them come forward through accredited representatives and lay their terms on the table. We have laid ours, and they know what they are.

"BUT behind all this grim purpose, my friends, lies the opportunity to demonstrate not only force, which will be demonstrated to the utmost, but the opportunity to demonstrate character, and it is that opportunity that we have most conspicuously in the work of the Red Cross. Not that our men in arms do not represent our character, for they do, and it is a character which those who see and realize appreciate and admire; but their duty is the duty of force. The duty of the Red Cross is the duty of mercy and succor and friendship.

"Have you formed a picture in your imagination of what this war is doing for us and for the world? In my own mind I am convinced that not a hundred years of peace could have knitted this nation together as this single year of war has knitted it together, and better even than that, if possible, it is knitting the world together. Look at the picture. In the center of the scene, four nations engaged against the world, and at every point of vantage, showing that they are seeking selfish aggrandizement; and, against them, twenty-three Governments representing the greater part of the population of the world, drawn together into a new sense of community of interest, a new sense of community of purpose, a new sense of unity of life. . . .

"FRIENDSHIP is the only cement that will ever hold the world together. And this intimate contact of the great Red Cross with the peoples now is to serve one another, and no man can afford to make a fortune out of this war. There are men among us who have forgotten that, if they ever saw it. Some of you are old enough—I am old enough—to remember men who made fortunes out of the Civil War, and you know how they were regarded by their fellow-citizens. That was a war to save one country—this is a war to save the world. And your relation to the Red Cross is one of the relations which will relieve you of the

"Down in your hearts you can't take very much satisfaction in the last analysis in lending money to the Government of the United States, because the interest which you draw will burn your pockets. . . .

"But when you give, something of your heart, something of your soul, something of yourself goes with the gift, particularly when it is given in such form that it never can come back by way of direct benefit to yourself. . . . These things are bestowed in order that the world may be a fitter place to live in, that men may be succored, that homes may be restored, that suffering may be relieved, that the face of the earth may have the blight of destruction taken away from it, and that wherever force goes there shall go mercy and helpfulness.

"AND when you give, give absolutely all that you can spare, and don't consider yourself liberal in the giving. If you give with self-adulation, you are not giving at all, you are giving to your own vanity; but if you give until it hurts, then your heart-blood goes into it.

"And think what we have here! We call it the American Red Cross, but it is merely a branch of a great international organization, which is not only recognized by the statutes of each of the civilized governments of the world, but it is recognized by international agreement and treaty, as the recognized and accepted instrumentality of mercy and succor. And one of the deepest stains that rests upon the reputation of the German Army is that they have not respected the Red Cross.

"That goes to the root of the matter. They have not respected the instrumentality they themselves participated in setting up as the thing which no man was to touch, because it was the expression of common humanity. We are members, by being members of the American Red Cross, of a great fraternity and comradeship which extends all over the world. . . .

"It fills my imagination, ladies and gentlemen, to think of the women all over this country who are busy tonight and are busy every night and every day doing the work of the Red Cross, busy with a great eagerness to find out the most serviceable thing to do, busy with a forgetfulness of all the old frivolities of their social relationships, ready to curtail the duties of the household in order that they may contribute to this common work that all their hearts are engaged in, and in which their hearts become acquainted with each other.

"When you think of this, you realize how the people of the United States are being drawn together into a great intimate family whose heart is being used for the service of the soldiers not only, but for the service of civilians, where they suffer and are lost in a maze of distresses and distractions. And you have, then, this noble picture of justice and mercy as the two servants of liberty. For only where men are free do they think the thoughts of comradeship; only where they are free do they think the thoughts of sympathy; only where they are free are they mutually helpful; only where they are free do they realize their dependence upon one another and their comradeship in a common interest and common necessity. . . .

"IF you could catch some of those voices that speak the utter longing of oppressed and helpless peoples all over the world, to hear something like the Battle Hymn of the Republic, to hear the feet of the great hosts of liberty going to set them free, to set their minds free, set their lives free, set their children free, you would know what comes into the heart of those who are trying to contribute all the brains and power they have to this great enterprise of liberty.

"I summon you to the comradeship. I summon you in this next week to say how much and how sincerely and how unanimously you sustain the heart of the world."

who are suffering the terrors and deprivations of this war is going to be one of the greatest instrumentalities of friendship the world ever knew. . . .

"My friends, a great day of duty has come, and duty finds a man's soul as no kind of work can ever find it. May I say this? The duty that faces us all stigma. You can't give anything to the Government of the United States; it won't accept it. . . . The only thing that the Government will accept is a loan, and duties performed; but it is a great deal better to give than to lend or to pay, and your great channel for giving is the American Red Cross.

The Progress of the War

ALTHOUGH on May 18 Germany appeared to have made every possible preparation for the resumption of her great offensive, the initiative still remained in Allied hands. On the night of the 18th British and Australian troops, in a swift local attack over a short front, took from the Germans the village of Ville-sur-Ancres, between Morlancourt and Albert, directly north of the former. North of the village the British troops waded waist-deep in a flooded swamp, while to the south it was necessary to first take the heavily fortified height. On the morning of the 19th the village was entirely in British hands, the Germans being driven down to the Amiens-Albert railroad, greatly improving the British positions and increasing the difficulty of attack from that direction. In this operation the British captured more than 400 prisoners and 20 machine-guns.

On the 19th the French, pushing forward on a front more than two miles northeast of Loere, advanced their lines materially, capturing over 400 prisoners and machine-guns. Berlin declared that a French attack on Kemmel had broken down. The ground gained gave the French stronger positions on the ridge running westward of Kemmel toward Mont Scherpenburg.

On the 20th Gen. Haig's troops snuffed out a German salient in the sector northwest of Merville on the Lys front in Flanders, southwest of Loere, making advances on a front of 1,200 yards, taking 30 prisoners and six machine-guns, and holding the new positions under heavy bombardment and against a determined counter-attack.

IT is now becoming evident that the discussion of the causes leading to the loss of spiritual power in many of our churches is not to be unproductive of good results. That the interest has spread to all the denominations is of itself a hopeful sign. Now that the need of a concerted and serious effort for spiritual restoration is very generally admitted, there is seen the further hope of a revival of those things that are essential to the future of the Christian churches of America.

We are especially glad to note that the great question at issue is now being discussed by the leaders in a broad-minded and kindly spirit. This is fortunately true of all the denominations, and is making itself manifest on both sides of the Atlantic. One of the most notable of recent addresses on the subject is that of Rev. Robert F. Horton, D.D., a prominent British Congregational pastor. There, as here, the young men seem to have been estranged from the Church, and have sought other ways of promoting human welfare and other channels through which to realize their dreams of national righteousness. Conceding this estrangement, Dr. Horton seeks to find the causes. He finds, first, that there is weakness through lack of unity on many questions that are essential to the existence and progress of the Church. Next, he finds that another obstacle in the way has been that the formulary, the rites and practices of the Church, are in many respects antiquated, and impress the minds of men as being stiff, conservative and unnatural. A third cause is that many of the teachings of the Church tend too much toward conservatism, whereas the Gospel, with its infinite variations and its innumerable impressions, is in itself ever new. Still another and very serious obstacle to the spiritual progress of the Church, he finds in the alignment with wealth, which has put the Church out of harmony with labor and its aspirations. It is charged that the Church has come to depend too much upon money and consequently treats possessors of wealth with special deference, whereas the true spirit of the Church should be that expressed by Peter: "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have, that give I thee. In the name of Jesus of Nazareth, arise and walk." God is no respecter of persons. The ministry of Jesus was largely among the poor, and the common people heard him gladly.

There is a last reason, which many believe is alone sufficient to explain the Church's condition. Concerning this he says: "It lies in the fact that the Church has lost or overlaid the Gospel, which made the Church and which alone can give it reality and value. The Church has lost something; she does not teach that which she had as the sacred gift of God to the world, but she teaches very largely the views she takes of that great gift, or she puts the great gift aside and discusses other questions as if they were of equal importance. She has for many years past predominantly talked of love and been silent about sin; she has tried to give a rose-water view of life and to picture a God of infinite good nature, until the Cross she preaches has become an offense again and practically meaningless.

"We have come to a point in the history of the world where the realization of evil is forced upon us; rose-water views of life have no value for us. We have no room for people who are forever expatiating on the virtue and divinity of human nature. We find that a high and Christless civilization is more like a wild beast than man. Human nature stands before us in its hideous inhumanity and corruption, and we see the failure of the Church in that the Church flattered men instead of telling them what they were. The Church talks softly about their virtues instead of arousing them to a sense of their weakness. The failure lay exactly there—that the central truth of life, which is the Cross of Christ, lost its meaning in pretty phrases and empty talk about love and humanity and brotherhood. She did not teach men the truth. She went on implying that all men required was a little love to one another; she did not tell them and make them feel that what they required was holiness, goodness, the Cross of Christ as the revelation of holy love, God as holy love, the sin of man, the love of God, the Son of God made sin for man, the new birth, the absolute necessity of a spiritual life that is rooted in the nature of God and is manifested in the radical change of the human heart until it becomes sweet and pure and loving. That is where the Church has failed."

These words, which we believe to be spoken in all kindness, come as a message to ourselves. They reveal the spirit that is moving in the churches abroad and which is already being felt very widely in our own churches. While we know that there are in many of our churches ministers who present the Gospel faithfully, it is unhappily true that, as this preacher has declared of the Church overseas, there are many here who, if they put the question to their own hearts, would hesitate to answer. Does your Church exalt the Cross, or has the blessed hope it holds out to sinners been overlaid or lost sight of? Is your Church fulfilling its mission in winning souls? Has it catered to the wealth and influence of the worldly, instead of seeking the imperishable riches? Has it emphasized the virtues of individual character in elaborate ministries in which the Gospel was forgotten? If it has done none of these things, but has held up the Crucified One as the world's Saviour and its only Hope, happy indeed is that Church. It has not lost sight of the Cross.

The Second Line of Defense

THE spirit of America has been well shown by the manner in which our people have welcomed the Red Cross drive. Very quickly were the $100,000,000 rolled up and then many millions superadded for good measure. The reason for this spontaneous outflow is found in the fact that Americans no longer regard a gift to the Red Cross as a charity, pure and simple, from which no return is to be expected beyond the satisfaction of knowing that the giver has done a good deed. The Red Cross is more than any charity; it is the Nation's Second Line of Defense. The returns that come from our investment in the Red Cross are dividends in the form of a stronger, cleaner, more efficient army and navy, better able to win the war that is to save not only America but the world.

Our whole nation will be glad to see the Red Cross War Chest full and overflowing. Its work of humanity is world-wide. Its army of workers are the good angels of the training ground, the camp, the trenches and the hospitals. Countless messages from our men at the front testify to the value of the Red Cross ministries and to the love and admiration they bear that organization. Its work in the desolated lands, among the suffering multitudes in Europe, in the Near East, and wherever the conflict has swept, has been splendid beyond description.

In his message to the nation, issued on May 21, Secretary Baker paid this deserved tribute to the Red Cross: "Every battle-field in France speaks eloquent testimony of its merciful work. If the voice of the American Expeditionary Force could be heard, there would be no doubt concerning the responses of the United States. The terrors of battle are decreased and the horrors it entails are minimized by this greatest of relief agencies."

We congratulate the Red Cross on the success of its six-day drive. If the spirit of Clara Barton could but look now upon the magnificent organization which she founded, she would rejoice to see the fulfilment of her dreams of the future greatness of the Army of Humanity.

Harden on a "German Peace"

THAT free speech and the truth cannot be wholly stifled even in Germany, has been made evident on numerous occasions. In a recent issue of the newspaper, Die Zukunft, Maximilian Harden, its editor, who has repeatedly been disciplined and his paper suppressed, returns boldly to the charge that a German peace is simply a make-believe. He instances the case of Rumania, which he declares to have been tricked into a childish peace, the working out of which he likens to Shylock's iniquitous bargain with the merchant of Venice. By the terms imposed by Germany, the little kingdom—whose powers of resistance faded as the result of the Russian collapse—not only loses its chief seaport, but is condemned "to suffer, feed, clothe and pay the foreign army divisions on its soil," besides having to submit to requisitions of coal, oil and cattle, for which nothing is to be paid, as Rumania, following the magnificent example of the conqueror, "renounces" all war compensations. It is, of course, like all of Germany's peace bargains in the present war, wholly, one-sided, evil, ignoble and degrading, violating all the traditions of the generosity of the strong toward the weak.

So it has been with Belgium and Serbia, and with Russia, and so would it be with the Scandinavian countries, if the same conscienceless power were to have the opportunity. Little Finland already finds that, in welcoming the Germans to rid itself of Russia, it has fallen into far worse hands, which are expert in the whole game of plunder, from looting a city to despoiling a nation. How even Austria will ultimately fare at the hands of German absolutism, to which she is now irrevocably tied by a pledge which places all her forces at the disposal of her ally, is a problem of the immediate future. The Hapsburg empire may become a mere vassal of the Kaiser.

It would not be surprising indeed if Harden's temerity were again punished by imprisonment and the suppression of his paper; but the naked truth which he proclaims so boldly in defiance of official warnings will stir up a mighty lot of thinking among the Kaiser's subjects, many of whom, like the editor of Die Zukunft, are doubtless heartily sick of the war, which has not only cost millions of German lives but is sowing the seed from which must be reaped a harvest of enmities, shame and unavailing national regrets.

The Anti-Lynching Protest

THE shameful, humiliating conditions of which we are reminded by the negroes' memorial to the President and Congress on lynchings could be endured only by a people hardened to them by long tolerance. Our horror of atrocities abroad ought to be supplemented by commensurate horror of our own atrocities at home. If we are to command the respect of the world, or even of ourselves, we must awaken to the hideous American atrocity that is occurring almost daily and with scarcely any public comment or official check.

In the face of such a humiliating record as 222 lynchings in one year, who can sincerely profess that life is safe and human rights are sacred in this land of ours? The well-behaved negro is no safer than the ruffian, for nearly all the colored victims of 1917 were subsequently proved to have been innocent of wrongdoing. Many of them were women and children.

It is not a sectional shame, but a national one; there is no more safety in the North than in the South, for the most cruel of all massacres have taken place north of the Mason and Dixon line.

Race hatred, unreasoning as that is, is not the only license to lynchings, for whites as well as blacks are victims, on slightest trumped-up charges, and with little if any punishment of the perpetrators.

One of the greatest needs of a nation professing to be civilized and Christian is an awakening to this shameful situation.

Federal Farm Loans

THE general purposes of the Federal Farm Loan Act are to lower and equalize interest rates on first mortgage farm loans; to provide long-term loans with the privilege of repayment in instalments through a long or short period of years, at the borrower's option; to assemble the farm credits of the nation to be used as security for money to be employed in farm development; to stimulate cooperative action among farmers; to make it easier for the landless to get land; and to provide safe and sound long-term investments for the thrifty.

The machinery for the application of the Farm Loan Act is in three parts, as follows: The Federal Farm Loan Board, consisting of four members, named by the President, and the Secretary of the Treasury as chairman; the twelve Federal Land Banks located in various sections of the country; the many National Farm Loan Associations organized and controlled by the borrowers themselves, each made up of ten or more farmers.

The Federal Farm Loan Board exercises supervision over the entire system. The Federal Land Banks make the loans and issue their bonds or debentures to investors. The national Farm Loan Associations are organizations of borrowers, and through them application for loans are made to the Federal Land Banks.

A National Farm Loan Association is a group of ten or more farmers which is organized as the local unit in the Federal farm loan system. A person desiring to make a loan should apply for membership in the nearest Farm Loan Association. If there is no such association within easy reach, he should join with other farmers to organize one in his community. The most important unit of this entire banking system is the local cooperative association organized by ten or more farmers. It is the door through which the farmer borrower enters into the benefits of the system. It is the cooperative agency which gives the machinery for borrowing and investing, for voting, and for protection against loss. It is the foundation stone of the whole system.

To get the full benefit of this system, it is to the interest of the farmers to organize into these groups as quickly as possible.

Rode Up Capitol Steps

MOUNTED on a spirited black horse, a man the other day plunged through the Capitol grounds at Washington and began the ascent of the western steps. So rapid was his progress up the stairway that he was half way to the western portal before the Capitol policeman awoke to the danger of a cavalry attack. Other policemen came to the rescue and met the bold invader and his charger at the second terrace. "What's the big idea?" demanded bluecoat No. 1. "I've come to bring a little horse sense to Congress," announced the mysterious cavalier. "Well, you've got a lot of confidence to ride right in here uninvited," replied the policeman. "Sure I have," asserted the rider. "I am chock full of confidence, and the horse is chock full of sense, and between us we're going to do Congress a whole lot of good." The rider was persuaded that the easiest way to enter the Capitol was through the eastern doorways, and he permitted himself to be led to the office of the captain of police, while his horse was tethered in the Capitol park. To the captain the man explained that he was from Albany, New York, and that he had hired the horse of a livery stable in Georgetown for the purpose of sight-seeing. Riding toward the Capitol, he took a notion that confidence and horse sense were necessary for Congress at this time, and concluded to ride up the steps and into the halls and give it to them. The police authorities handed the man over to the District of Columbia Health Department for examination as to his sanity. The livery stable man has had a good advertisement, but he was said to be very angry, as he did not care to have his horses featured as trained to stair-climbing or butting against Congress. It ought not to take the commission long to determine that there is something wrong in the man's mind, and yet there is a deal of truth in what he said, that the imperative need of Congress is confidence and good horse sense. Fortunately, Congress has these—has confidence in the cause and in its victorious issue, and has backed up lavishly and loyally every material request the President has made. This great truth the man emphasized, which is so necessary to Congress and all departments of the government, even to the heroes in the trenches: "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong." (1 Cor. 16: 13.)

Governor's Six Soldier Boys

SIX sons of Governor and Mrs. Rich-ard I. Manning of South Carolina have entered their country's service. On the enlistment of the sixth son, the other day, the New York Herald sent his father a telegram of congratulation, to which this reply was wired: "My sixth son, Vivian Meredith Manning, is enlisting as a volunteer. My seventh son is only fifteen years old. Your congratulations appreciated." Could any picture be more beautiful and inspiring than this of six splendid sons of fine lineage, education, and culture, dropping everything that the world calls most desirable and going forth at the call of duty to defend their country's flag? Beautiful, brave boys are they, and singularly honored are their father and mother in their loyalty and sacrifice. The loyalty and sacrifice of the parents in giving their sons is as great as that of the boys in offering their services. Governor Manning gave six sons, all he had of soldier age. Some parents have given an only son to the service, an only son to die for their country, calling to mind the gift by the heavenly Father of his only Son to die for the salvation of the world. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." (John 3: 16.)

Horsehides and Footballs

IT is possible that the national game of baseball may be interfered with by a recent order of the government for-the civilian population, it is said. These gloves are made of finer grades of leather. The chief occupation of the early Jew was the raising of cattle. He soon learned to make leather out of the raw hides, and he early used that leather as an important feature in his wearing apparel. As far back as the Prophets there is this mention of it: "And they answered him, He was a hairy man, and girt with a girdle of leather about his loins. And he said, It is Elijah the Tishbite." (II Kings 1: 8.)

Alaska Teacher Adopts Orphans

MRS. CORRINE CALL, the oldest government teacher in point of service in Alaska, is hailed by the thousands of Eskimos and Indians throughout the vast Northern territory as Alaska's "Emissary of Humanity." She has been a teacher in the Northland for nearly twenty years, and has served in most of the remote villages, in many instances being the only white person there. She has adopted four Eskimo orphans. She recently brought some Northern waifs to Seattle, Wash., on their first trip to "the outside." What an exalted calling is that of the teacher! The really great persons of the world are not those that sit on thrones, or carry swords, or found empires in blood, but those who teach the children truth and tell them how to live right and to love. The real greatness of a nation is in its intellect and in its heart. The teachers do not attract much attention, nor draw much pay, but they are the real empire-builders. Our American democracy would have been an impossibility but for our system of general education. Most of the teachers of rich and poor have the benevolent instinct as the impelling motive. It was strikingly illustrated in Mrs. Call, who went in the service of her country with her education and culture out to the inhospitable and neglected districts of Alaska twenty years ago to teach the young truth, honor, duty, love. And now she crowns her life of enlightenment and benevolence by adopting four Eskimo waifs into her own home and making them her own children. What a beautiful thing it is to do, how Christly it is, and what an example she sets to the whole nation. The Jewish law provided for the adoption of children of other parents into a family. This act is referred to as a type of our adoption into the divine family through the mission of Christ. "God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." (Gal. 4: 4, 5.)

Caught by Finger Print

ATINY piece of glass found in a loft of a building which had been robbed February 27, led to the conviction of the thief the other day. The inspector of police testified that the glass had been brought to headquarters, sprinkled with powder and photographed, and that the photograph had upon it a finger print which tallied in every respect with the print of the prisoner's fingers on file with the police department. The Judge sent him to State prison for two years and a half. We make our tracks in the dust or snow everywhere we go, and leave the mark of our finger prints on everything we lay our hands on. The eye, the heart, the tips of the fingers, are witnesses for the prosecution against the wrongdoer. The convict called on account of his climbing agility the "Human Ape," can appreciate this truth: "Be sure your sin will find you out." (Num. 32: 23.)

$150,000,000 Barge Canal

THE New York State Barge Canal, completed at a cost of over $150,000,000, was opened to through traffic between the Hudson River and the Great Lakes on May 15. Formal observance of the opening will be held later, probably July 4. The main line of the Barge Canal, which follows in part the route of the famous old Erie Canal from Troy to Buffalo, is 352 miles long. The tributary Oswego and Cayuga-Seneca Canals give an additional mileage of 100. The Champlain Canal, connecting Lake Champlain and the Hudson, is eighty miles in length, making the total mileage of the New York system of artificial navigable waterways 532. Traffic experts and engineers estimate the main line's capacity at 10,000,000 tons annually, equal to a half-million freight-car loads. Control of the canal traffic was taken over by the Federal government on April 17 in connection with the administration of all transportation lines. In the construction of the Barge Canal more than 100,000,000 cubic yards of rock and earth were excavated. Three million cubic yards of concrete have been used in constructing locks, dams, retaining walls, etc. Canals are of ancient origin. From the writings of Herodotus, Aristotle, Pliny and others we learn that canals existed in Egypt before the Christian era. The section of the Grand Canal of China, the one from the Yangtse to the Hwei River, 130 miles in length, was opened as early as 486 B. C. The ancient barge canals were unlike those of our time in that they had no locks by which boats could be transferred from one level to another. It is only in comparatively recent times that the principle of the lock was discovered, some say in Italy, others in Holland. Man in the construction of waterways has illustrated his creative force in imitation of that of the Almighty, who made the rivers and the channel in which they should run. The prophet thus refers to that divine creative energy: "Thou didst cleave the earth with rivers." (Hab. 3: 9.)

Record Time in Building

ABUILDING 230 feet long and thirty feet wide was constructed and equipped in one day at the big United States base hospital at Staten Island, New York, recently. Three hundred men went to work on the building, promptly at seven o'clock, and at noon the structure was completed. By dusk it had been equipped. We are engaged in the construction of a building that cannot be erected in a day. It is the building of character and requires time. The materials out of which it is constructed are thoughts, feelings, deeds, habits; the model is Christ; its plans and specifications are in the Bible, and when furnished it becomes the residence of the Holy Spirit. "Ye are God's building." (1 Cor. 3: 9.)

bidding the use of horsehides in the making of covers for balls. Virtually all leather which has been used either in making the balls or the gloves and protectors of players has been commandeered by the government. The diversion of leather for army purposes will not affect the supply of gloves for

TEXT—John 16:33. "These things have I spoken unto you that in me ye may have peace. In the world ye have tribulation; but be of good cheer: I have overcome the world."

IHAVE overcome the world." And yet could there be anything more suggestive of failure than the circumstances in which these words were spoken? Treachery had broken out in the disciple band. Judas had gone out bent upon the malign purpose of selling the Lord. A mob was even now assembling to drag him to judgment, and Calvary, and death. And it was in conditions like these that the Master proclaimed his triumph!

And who was the Conqueror? A poor Galilean peasant, speaking a provincial accent, obscure and uninfluential, having no place to lay his head! Let me say it again, he is about to be betrayed, to be deserted, to be put to the most contemptuous and humiliating death! And yet this man claims to be wearing the purple of sovereignty, to be trailing mystic clouds of glory even while he was marching to the tomb! He had not gone down before the world, he had not shared its tone, he had not been inflicted by its contagion, he had not bowed to its compromises, he had not been ensnared by its seductions, he had not sunk to its degradations. He had "overcome the world." Let us contemplate the prominent features of the victory.

He had overcome the smiles of the world. And that is ever the subtlest and most paralyzing of all enticements. If we can make comparisons between the different moments in Christ's life, one would say that the peril was greater when they "took him by force to make him a king" than when "all men forsook him and fled." Many a man can keep his moral health in defeat who is overcome with success. An illustration can be found on the public platform. Every public man knows that there is nothing so insidious as the snare of applause.

A man can walk the narrow way when he is confronted by a hostile audience, but he is in great jeopardy when he is met by nothing but cheers. It is then he is liable to be "carried away" by the enthusiasm into grave imprudences. Ben Jonson used to say that "of all wild beasts, preserve me from the tyrant; and of all tame beasts, a flatterer."

I suppose that the culminating point of temptation in the life of the apostle Paul was not when he encountered the violence of the mob at Lystra, but when the people magnified his importance and declared that "the gods are come down" in the guise of men. Now, the Lord met this seductive smile of the world, and did not succumb to it. He was not deluded into a shining servitude.

AND he had overcome the suspicions of the world. There is something very affrighting in the contemplation of an untrue eye. Men are frequently overcome by the malicious eyes of their fellows. And this was the kind of "look" which was ceaselessly fixed upon the Lord. "And they watched him!" It is the kind of sight which misinterprets all it sees. It imputes ill motives and turns everything awry. Before that kind of onslaught many men succumb. They are driven from the post of duty by malicious tongues; they retire from the fight. A man said in my hearing some little while ago that "public life had become intolerable," and that he was determined to retire into privacy. "Good-by, proud world, I'm going home!" And this man allowed the world to drive him from the field of service. But that was not the way of the Master. He would not turn back because men fixed upon him an evil eye. He would not turn aside from the appointed way because of the unfriendly gaze of his enemies. He stood up, and strode on, unafrighted and undeterred by malice and frown.

And he overcame the contempt of the world. Many a man can bear a wrong who cannot bear an insult. Our Lord was "despised." "He hath a devil and is mad." He was denied common courtesy. He was refused the ordinary amenities of hospitality. There was no water for him when He came in from the dusty way. There was no kiss of recognition and welcome. "He was despised and rejected of men." And yet he was not unmanned by the contempt. It did not make him hard, unforgiving, resentful, and revengeful. It did not turn him sour. He was not overcome by the treatment. He went through it in sovereign and unimpaired health and holiness. All these antagonisms, arising from smiles, and frowns, and contempts, and neglects, he faced and conquered.

And in what disposition was the triumph won? First, he overcame the world by a refusal to stoop to use the powers of the world. He would never use the world's sword. He would never use the fires of persecution. He never put his hand to mere coercives and compulsions. He sought spiritual ends by spiritual means, and he never sought to elicit the aid of unworldly kings. Herod sought his friendship. "He was desirous to see him of a long season," but the Lord refused the intercourse, and "he answered him nothing."

AND, secondly, he overcame the world by a calmness that was nourished in heavenly places. He never exposed himself to the peril of feverishness and passion. In the moments of temptation he retired to the Mount. Even in the midst of the crowd he had quiet communion with the Eternal. He knew how to make a solitude even in the very heart of publicity. He could make a sanctuary amid the very clamor of the market-place. And so he kept his spirit cool, and the perilous fire was never kindled. "I am not alone; the Father is with me."

And he overcame the world by a patience which waited for the hour to strike, and which would not be hustled into premature action. One of the first temptations with which the devil assails a man is in the attempt to prove to him that his noble purpose is infamous, or needless, or impossible. If he fails in this temptation he proceeds on quite another tack. Seeing that we are immovable in our resolves, he next attempts to make us precipitate in its execution. "Don't wait," he says. "Get it over at once! Delay is a mark of infidelity; the King's business requireth haste!" And so we are frequently "rushed," and the holy purpose is spoiled by its lack of holy restraint. Jesus refused to be rushed. "Mine hour is not yet come!" He waited thirty years before beginning his ministry, and there is a wonderful sense of quiet leisureliness about him characterizing even his public life. He waited for the clock to strike, and when it had struck he acted, and never swerved.

And he conquered the world by a love that flowed fresh and full to the very end of his days. "Having loved . . . he loved to the end." Even Calvary did not embitter his spirit! Even the shadow of death did not sour his soul by the sense of defeat. The reviling of those who passed by the cross brought no cynical response. The only reply was this: "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do!" And so he died, a conqueror in dying, having overcome the world in the very moment when it seemed that the world was most triumphant.

NOW we have to face the same antagonisms. "In the world ye have tribulation." We have to be in the same straits. We have to encounter the perils of the smile, and the frown, and the contempt, and the suspicion, and the neglect. We, too, have to pass from shine into shadow, and to face the menace of the sword and the seductions of the crown. "But be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." But what is that to thee and me? It is everything to thee and me.

There is power in the Lord's conquest to make conquerors of all. "In me ye may have peace." Not in ordinances, not in bare religious exercises, not in human fellowship, not in Nature's oratory; these may all be helpful means, but they are not radical and ultimate. The deep fundamental peace is to be found only in Christ. "In me ye may have peace," but to be in Christ is to be more than a companion. Earthly relationships supply no word sufficiently intimate and immediate. It is nearer than linked arms and clasped hands; it is the inconceivable union of oneness and spirit. It is the union of the branch with the vine.

Our lives can become embedded in the Lord, and his conquering energies, like rising sap, will fill our moral and spiritual powers, until we, too, become triumphant. We become more than conquerors through him that loves us. "Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

When Mother Sang

By ANNE PORTER JOHNSON

THEY tell us now her singing lacked
In tonal quality;
Her voice was never true to sound,
She often missed the key!
They say she could not read the notes—
She learned the songs by ear;
But this I know, when mother sang,
We stopped our play to hear.

"By Cool Siloam's Shady Rill"
Came trembling, solemn, low;
And "Mary to the Saviour's Tomb,"
In tones all sacred-slow.
"Sweet Galilee," and "By and By,"
And then "Sweet Hour of Prayer,"—
When mother sang on Sabbath days,
The firelight on her hair.

A hope lies deep within my heart,
That on some shining way
Where all is joy and sweet content,
And happy children play,
A group of wee ones—can it be?—
Are gathered round her chair
To listen, eager-eyed and rapt,
When mother sings—up There!

DAILY MEDITATION

Prof. W. H. T. Dau

Keeping in Tune

SUNDAY, June 9. Deut. 6:7. "Thou shalt talk of them when thou walkest by the way." He was not to be satisfied with stated and formal times of meditation when his mind was to reverently consider the law of the Lord. He was to use his odd moments in quest of the divine treasure, and he was to nourish the divine communion in his ordinary converse as he walked along the way. He was not only to consecrate the larger seasons, when he would tune his instrument; he was to give it devoted attention whenever his circumstances provided an opening. And that, I think, is most needed counsel in the culture of the soul. We not only need the prolonged times of praise, but also the short swallow-flights of song. We want the leisurely communion, but we also want the sharp ejaculation which expresses itself in a single word. We need the long gaze at our Lord, and we need the frequent glance.

I have been told that Mr. Chase, the great American artist who recently passed to his rest, was in the habit of carrying about in his pocket small objects which he enjoyed looking at, an exquisite ring, or some rarely attractive curiosity. He had his long seasons of studious contemplation of the loveliness that he yearned to capture in line and color. But he had also moments of gazing when he turned his eyes on some beautiful thing. And we may follow his plan in the deepest things of the spirit. We can carry a divine signet ring about with us. We can carry with us through the day some great word of glorious revelation, and at odd moments we can bring it out and look into the depths of its eternal beauty. What is to prevent the busiest among us having some rich promise of grace which we can bring out and look at as we walk by the way? Perhaps we depend too much on the large and formal occasions, and we undervalue the ordinary times which stretch between these more dignified seasons, and which might be broken up into short and occasional glances at the treasures of the King. There are things we can ponder as we bow in the temple; there are lovely things we can look at as we go along the road.

Power Through Fellowship

MONDAY, June 10. I John 1:7. "If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another." Light is the best possible symbol of God. It is pure, purifying, incorruptible and life-giving. Hence light is also the best possible symbol of the Christian life. All the material light in the world is derived from the sun. All our spiritual light is derived from God. To walk in the light is to walk in the way of his commandments. What if we walk in his light? What shall we have? Fellowship. Is not this greatly to be desired? Surely we all would like to live in a friendly universe. The ties which bind Christians together make large contributions to the friendliness of the world. Ours is the fellowship of mystery—we have been initiated into the common secrets of grace. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." Ours is the fellowship of suffering. Mutual trials make mutual ties. Ours is the fellowship of citizenship, and of a common task, to make the kingdom of God world-wide. Ours is the fellowship of kindred minds, that is, similarity of ideals. There is a significant statement of Lecky with reference to the early church: "There has probably never existed a community upon earth whose members were bound to one another by a deeper and purer affection than the Christians in the days of the persecutions." Also Benjamin Kidd: "Self seemed to be annihilated. All boundaries of classes, even of nationalities and races, went down before the new affinities which overmastered the strongest instincts of men's minds."

If Christians are bound together by ties so strong and so numerous as these, then what is it which keeps so many bodies of Christians apart? Traditions, inherited prejudices, misunderstandings, but, more than anything else, indifference to the Master's passionate prayer for unity. It was well said of a great pastor who left an indelible impression upon the life of his generation, "His whole life was an argument for Christian unity. He cherished all who love the name of Christ." Perhaps it may be permitted one contributor to this page to pay tribute to another. Then this may be said of my neighbor, Dr. Jowett, at the close of his fruitful pastorate in New York: Dr. Jowett's preaching has charmed the multitudes, but his personality has added wings to his words. No more catholic-spirited minister than he has stood in an American pulpit in our generation. He has exemplified in his relations to Christians of all names the rule John Wesley loved to quote: "In essentials unity, in non-essentials liberty, in all things charity."

His Perfectness

TUESDAY, June 11. Deut. 32:4. "He is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he." Filled with the Spirit of God, Moses stands before the congregation of Israel and delivers his valedictory oration. What he says he speaks in the name of God, and calls heaven and earth to witness. What need, we ask, was there of opening his address with a solemn assertion of God's truthfulness, rectitude, and probity? Can man become so degraded in mind as to impute lying, dishonesty, crookedness to God?

Yes, human nature, in its corrupt state and completely alienated from that original purity and righteousness in which it was created, has thus thought and spoken of God as a deceiver. Pagan religions recognize untruthful gods. Pagan gods are the fabrications of men's imagination.

The product cannot be better than the producer. If men will make their gods, they will make them like unto themselves. Even in the finer form of idolatry to which the human heart, left to itself, is prone, in that idolatry which does not fall down before an image but is estranged at heart from God, we find distrust and suspicion of God.

Oh, what must God suffer from the perverse and vile heart of unbelievers! What a grievous insult it is felt to be among men when their reputation for truthfulness is attacked! It rouses men to prompt and stern resentment; it is regarded as an unpardonable offense. Yet that is what every form of unbelief does to God: it gives him the lie; it pronounces him unreliable. With infinite patience God not only bears this shocking, calumny, stays his avenging hand against his base insulters, but even condescends to assure man that he is not what some take him to be: a liar. We consider it an extreme humiliation, if we must preface a statement that we are about to make with the assertion of our veracity; what an astounding kindness, then, is it on the part of God that he who is conscious of his unchanging faithfulness does not shrink from telling man that he can be trusted!

The Nation's Flag

WEDNESDAY, June 12. Isa. 11:12. "And he shall set up an ensign for the nation." Our Star-spangled Banner is the symbolic concentration of the principles of American liberty. Its waving folds stand for all we are and hope to be. The wealth and spirit, the power and strength of our people are behind the flag, ever following it to victory. When other nations are in peril, uttering the Macedonian cry, we answer, "Our country is the world; our countrymen are mankind."

Old Glory was first waved by Washington and now mingles with the flags of all nations as the mother of republics on many shores. The flag is the picture of the Declaration of Independence, the ensign of our institutions. None should ever be ashamed of Old Glory, especially when they remember that it has floated victoriously over Yorktown, New Orleans, Mexico, Appomattox, Manila and Santiago, and soon may wave its peaceful folds over the European conflict. We should be proud that it has never trailed in the dust of defeat or dishonor, and it ever points to grander achievements in the future of the race of mankind. Its cry is "Freedom from the golden bands of kingly power or from the iron shackles of tyrannical despots!" To die on the field of battle in defense of human liberty is glory enough for any patriot. Nothing is greater unless it be to help perpetuate freedom in the peaceful progress of truth and justice. Prosperity should ever mean larger civilization, wider human privileges, longer life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Christ's Appeal to the Individual

THURSDAY, June 13. John 12:26. "If any man serve me, him will my Father honor." The appeal of Jesus was always to the individual. He was supremely an individualist. He never built up or attempted to build up an institution. There were institutions in that day as in ours. Judaism was an institution, a system, and he referred to it when he said, "I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil." That Jesus did destroy Judaism as a living faith is clear. With the decline of orthodox Judaism and with the rise of the so-called liberal Judaism (which is neither Judaism nor liberal) it is growing clearer. But Jesus destroyed Judaism by simply fulfilling it. We can destroy things very effectively by filling them so full they fall apart. A growing apple destroys the blossom out of which it grows. A ripening ear of corn destroys its own husk. A promissory note is destroyed when it is paid. Prophecy is destroyed when it comes to pass. Slavery was an institution when Jesus was among men, yet he never attacked it. He set the individual soul at liberty. He implanted the love of freedom in the heart of his people. It was as certain as destiny that when a sufficient number of souls were free, free from sin and selfishness, free in the knowledge of the truth, all slaves would be set free.

The appeal of Jesus was always to the individual. He never talked about reaching the masses or the classes—He reached them. He knew that masses and classes are composed of individuals. So to this man and to that woman he said, "Believe in me, come to me, learn of me, follow me."

Blessing Irreversible

FRIDAY, June 14. Num. 23:19, 20. "God is not a man that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good? Behold, I have received commandment to bless: and he hath blessed; and I cannot reverse it." That no counsel of man can stand against the decree of sovereign God is so plain a lesson that even a cursory reader of this text must apprehend it. Nor would this be the only place in the Bible where this truth has been voiced.

But this general truth is here made very specific; the speaker declares that the intended blessing of God, once decided upon, is irreversible. On the one hand, the character of God is such that he will never go back on his own word; on the other hand, no agent whom God chooses to convey his blessing has the power to annul it. What a mighty incentive to faith in the promises of God is contained in this text!

Yea, if we remember who the speaker in this text is, and on what occasion these words were spoken, our faith will receive still greater confirmation. Balaam had come, hired as a most powerful magician, to blast the people of Israel with his withering curses, and thus keep them out of the promised land. It appears that for filthy lucre's sake Balaam was ready to employ his knowledge of the true God for this hideous purpose. God would have amply revealed his almighty power if he had merely turned the erring prophet from his wicked mission and sent him home after the reprimand which he had administered to him by the mouth of the prophet's beast. But God chose to become still more glorious by bidding the prophet to proceed on his journey and do not what the Moabite king but what the King of kings would command him to do. Balaam had come to curse; he stayed to bless. Against his own choice his imprecations turned to benedictions on his lips. Balaam had to confess: God hath blessed, and I cannot reverse it. Let us remember this when wicked men want to invoke the wrath of heaven on us.

Bearing the Cross

SATURDAY, June 15. Matt. 10:38. "He that taketh not his cross is not worthy of me." Our Lord was no doubt contemplating Calvary when he said to his disciples, "Let him take up his cross and follow me." When Jesus became too weak to bear the heavy burden of the wooden cross, one Simon was found to bear it for him.

It is said that when Charles Simeon, a university professor, was in a great trouble he strolled forth one day reading his Greek Testament as he went and praying that some comforting passage might be given him. The first text that caught his eye was this: "They found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name. Him they compelled to bear his cross." Simon being the same as Simeon, a great blessing came upon the professor, when he had the hint that he might bear the cross after Jesus. He truly felt it a great honor that he could participate in Christ's sufferings. Should we not suffer willingly with him that we may be glorified with him forever, singing,

Must Jesus bear the cross alone,
And all the world go free?
No, there's a cross for every one,
And there's a cross for me.

Should we not deny ourselves and take up our cross as willingly as Jesus bore the cross the Father gave him for humanity, remembering that the disciple is not above his Master? If the great aim of our life is to save it, we shall lose it, but losing it for the sake of Christ and the world, we shall find it forever. Let us remember Calvary that we may know what it means to follow Christ, going with him all the way, through the garden, up the hill, down to the sepulchre, and with him, ascend to glory.

Anne Foreman's Faith

By
C. COURTENAY SAVAGE

IT was almost noon when Millington stopped at the low white house. He hesitated before entering the gates, for the place had the air of a gentleman's estate where wayfarers might not be welcome; yet the fields and the barns beyond gave evidence that the tilling of land was not done in play.

For several minutes he rested under the shade of the cedar hedge, trying as best he might to overcome the spirit of fear that cast its shadow over him. Once he would have walked boldly to the door and asked if he might buy a meal; but the long silent months had made him timid. It was hunger and a lack of formality about the grounds that finally won him from going farther, and sent him boldly along the walk. He had eaten very little that morning—the excitement of being free was such that he could not wait for food. Now, however, he was faint, and the last sign-post had told him the nearest town was five miles away. He knocked sharply at the side door.

"I wonder if it would be possible for me to get something to eat?" he asked the woman who answered his summons.

"Why?"—the woman hesitated, and Millington saw that she was not more than twenty-six or seven, and that her eyes and hair were soft with the fulness of passing youth. As a girl she must have been beautiful.

"I have been walking since morning," Millington went on. "And if it would not be possible for me to get a meal, could you make me up some sandwiches? I want—I want to pay for them, of course."

The woman flushed.

"I—I don't think my brother would object to my giving you something to eat," she said quickly, "but—but I must confess that I hardly knew what to say to you. We don't make a practice of feeding tramps—but then you're not a tramp."

Millington raised his eyebrows, and then smiled.

"No—and yet in some ways I am a tramp. I'm out on the open road looking for work—work in the country; yet I'm not penniless—or what you'd ordinarily term a tramp."

The woman looked at him sharply. The shadow of a frown played across her face and then disappeared.

"Won't you come in?" she asked graciously. "Dinner will be ready in a minute—and if you'll excuse me I'll be back in a second."

SHE hurried into another room, leaving Millington in the hall. He went to one of the low, white-curtained windows and looked out. For several seconds he studied the garden, and turning from the window he moved about the hall studying the pictures. He did not know from that a partly opened door the woman watched him, or that from the window-seat at the end of the hall the family collie had raised himself to regard the stranger. After a minute, the dog jumped down to investigate. Millington turned, and the watching woman saw a pleased smile come over his face. He snapped his fingers at the animal, who moved nearer the man, wagging his tail. He sniffed at the ends of Millington's trousers, and then put his nose into the palm of the man's hand, as if inviting a caress. It was all that the woman wanted. The dog trusted him—somehow she felt that the dog knew. She opened the door, and came smilingly into the hall.

There was little time for talk. From the back of the house a bell was sounding the noon hour, as welcome a note to Millington as to the men in the fields.

"If you'll come this way I'll show you where you can wash," the woman said; and then, as if it were an afterthought, "I'm Miss Foreman. This is my brother's farm; I keep house for him."

"Thank you; and I am David Millington."

THE woman bowed to acknowledge the name. She directed him as she mounted the stairs, and told him they would wait for him in the dining-room. There was a mirror on one of the white-tiled walls, and Millington studied his reflection. He was tall, and very straight. The pallor which comes from confinement was missing, for part of his work had been out of doors. He was not handsome, but his mouth was delicately shaped, his eyes were keen, and his brown, ill-cut hair was brushed back to show his high forehead. He did not look a man capable of wrong; and with clenched fists he vowed that some day men would be proud of him—very proud of him!

With a sigh of determination he turned away from the mirror and ran the basin full of water. It was hot water—delicious to the touch—and he let his fingers play through the soap suds. He had never missed the luxury of hot water until this minute; and now he felt that freedom was indeed good.

As he washed his hands, he fell to wondering if he should tell these people about himself—that he was a man straight from prison. Only last night he had made his resolve that he would never try to hide the fact that he had done wrong and paid for it; but all his plans of the night before had been swept away in the moments following the clang of the hills which had beckoned so alluringly in the morning sunlight.

HE had no objective point in view as he wandered countryward; instead, the spirit of vagabondage led him across vacant fields, through clumps of woodland, along the edge of a softly flowing stream. Once he had fallen off to sleep at the foot of a great tree; again a sudden impulse had made him bathe in a swift running brook; and his wanderings had finally brought him to his place of comfort, and to the sweet-faced woman who had told him that they would be waiting him in the dining-room.

He wiped his hands on the soft linen, brushed back his prison-cut hair, and went down-stairs. The woman introduced him graciously, and it was good to feel the grip of another man's hand, and meet the frank gaze which was sent into his eyes. When they were seated about the table, Foreman started the conversation.

It was at the very end of the meal that Millington offered his first explanation of himself. He hardly knew what to tell them, but felt that even if these people did not ask questions, he must give some inkling of the reason for his being there.

"I don't know much about farming"—they had been talking about crops, and the opening seemed a good one—"but I made up my mind this morning that it was from the hills that my help would come. Last night I could hardly sleep for the plans that ran through my head—plans to make a fortune—and yet this morning it came over me with a sudden resolve that I must get away from the city, out into the farms and hills."

Foreman sent a quick glance in his sister's direction.

"And you could go at a moment's notice?" he asked Millington, rather incredulously.

"Yes. I haven't started my work in the city. I've been away for three years, and was on my way back. There was not any one who would vitally miss me. I can write them that I have changed my plans, and nothing will be thought of my non-arrival."

It seemed a weird story to Foreman, yet as his sister had told him there was something frankly simple about the man that made one believe in him.

"And you have no definite plans?" Anne Foreman asked.

"None, except that I must find work."

The meal was finished now, and they rose to leave the room.

"If you'd like I'll show you the place," Foreman offered, apparently ignoring the last remark. "We only raise fancy vegetables and fruits for the city markets. I'm very proud of my fields."

Millington followed him back to the big barns, and from there to the fields. Everywhere there was luxurious cultivation, rows of ripening vegetables, and laden fruit-trees. At the end of an hour they were back at the house.

"You say that you are looking for work?" Foreman asked bluntly.

"Yes."

"Can you figure—keep count?"

Something hot flashed over Millington. He could count—could he do it correctly? Could he do it honestly? Once he had thought so. Now—

"Yes," he said quickly. "I have always been considered rather an expert at figures."

Foreman hesitated a minute.

"What I need, and what I've never had, is a man who can keep track of the amount of produce shipped away, see that orders are properly filled, and look after the condition of the fruit and vegetables we ship; sort of an inspector. It would leave me free to do some work I have on hand, if I could find just the right man."

"And you think I might be the right man?" Millington asked.

Again Foreman hesitated.

"I should like you to try," he said simply.

The two men shook hands. Not another word passed between them, no question as to Millington's former existence, no questions as to honesty, nor, at the minute, even as to how much he was to earn. They went to the big room which Foreman used as heavy gates that had set him free. His original plan had been to go to the city and start work. He had never meant to take the money; he had firmly believed that the investments would prove of value; but the jury had found him guilty and he had served three years. Of course, he would pay back those whose money he had lost—every penny, as well as the interest.

The clang of the gates, the swift passing of an automobile, the mad pounding of his heart, the new shoes and clothes, they had all overwhelmed him, however, and in spite of all his resolve, he had not gone in the direction of the city, but made off for the an office and spent the afternoon in talking over the details of the farm; and when it was dusk Millington knew what was expected of him.

THE summer passed quickly. The long days were filled with work, and work meant forgetting—a blotting out of what had passed, and a lending of bright colors to the future.

There were moments, fiery brands that seared deep into the consciousness, when Millington could not forget. As the days progressed they resolved themselves into two great thoughts. One of them was Anne Foreman. He had never been a ladies' man, and until Anne, no woman save his mother had ever touched the hidden springs of his heart. His mother was gone from him now, and in her place was Anne. In a thousand little ways she had helped him in the trying weeks that followed his first day of freedom; her kindly smile seemed ever to beckon him from the other side of some heart-rending hour. Slowly it came to him that he loved Anne, and his practical being told him that first he must find the way to provide for her, and must prove to himself that his feet would forevermore dwell along the path which comes not in contact with the law.

It was the shadow of the law that lent terror to his other agonizing thought. He had not meant to steal that other time; he had never wilfully taken that which did not belong to him. Yet he had done so, and they had found him guilty. He remembered that as a small boy he had been used to taking what he wanted from his parents. He had never lied about it, never hesitated to say that he had taken ten cents from his bank, or a pie from the pantry shelf. The memories set him to wondering, to asking himself if there was that in his blood which made him a thief. Now that he was once more among men, could he "go straight," as the men in the jail had termed it?

All the summer he wondered and worried. He tried to tell himself that as the days went past and he had no inclination to steal, there was nothing to fear. The thought was not reassuring, however, for he knew that he handled nothing but small sums of money, and bags and baskets. What he feared was the supreme test—the time which might never come, when he would be trusted with large sums, when he would be in a position to steal and get away.

IT was in September that Foreman came to him as he was overseeing the packing of a shipment of vegetables, and told him that he was going away.

"I've got to go, Millington; it's a case of making big money if the project goes through. I can buy two neglected orange groves for a song, and by grafting they'll pay two or three hundred per cent. on the investment in a few years' time. I've got to go, and you've got to stay here and run the thing for me."

Millington's heart leaped. He was to be trusted with the care of the great farm.

"My sister will help you; she knows that you're going to be in charge; I've talked it all over with her."

Foreman was a man of few words. Millington had long since found out that he never spoke unless it was necessary. Frequently the two men would sit for hours without ever exchanging a comment. With Anne it was different. There had been times when Millington wondered if he had not better tell her the whole truth about himself. He felt sure that it would make no difference with her regard for him, for she seemed to peer beneath his outer consciousness and, reading his soul's struggle, knew that he was a man.

With the coming of Winter, Millington's tasks slackened perceptibly. The long evenings were spent indoors, studying scientific books on farming, talking with Anne, reading to her as she sewed; or, as frequently, in silently watching the logs as they sent twisted flames up the chimney.

THEY were alone in the big living-room one evening just after Christmas. Foreman had been home and started South again. Anne was to visit him in a month's time, and she had just mentioned that it hardly seemed possible that somewhere the world was bright with grass and flowers. Outside, the wind rattled through the icy trees, and beat the snow against the window-panes. For several minutes Millington made no comment.

"Yes"—his word was a half sigh—"there are times when it seems strange to picture another world than the one which surrounds us. I remember the first year and a half in the prison, trying to think what spring meant. I was in the shop the first year, and I seldom even got a glimpse of the grass in front of the warden's office."

The thunderbolt was launched! It had not been the effort that Millington imagined, and he glanced in Anne's direction. She continued her sewing as if nothing had happened.

There was a long silence.

"I have always wanted to tell you about myself—all about myself," Millington went on. "Yet I rather feared to. I was afraid that it might make some difference to you."

The woman looked up quickly.

"It will make no difference. I have always known that there was—something. I knew that you would tell me at the right time."

Millington jumped to his feet and paced the length of the room.

"It's not much of a story"—his words were crisp—"just the old, old tale which seems new to every one who passes through the fire."

Briefly he sketched her his crime, his trial, and the years of imprisonment.

"And that's all," he concluded, "except that the morning they let me out I developed blue funk and came in this direction, instead of going into the city. The rest of the story you know."

Anne let her sewing fall into her lap.

"Yes; and ahead of you is a life which will prove that a man can do wrong and then find his proper balance."

"You think that I will find my proper balance?"

"I know it. I trust you, David." She had never spoken his first name before; her tongue lingered over its syllables.

"But I am afraid that I do not trust myself," he said rather bitterly. Then, after a pause, "Oh, Anne! if only I did trust myself. If only I was sure that I was strong enough to resist temptation; if only I felt that I could go back with my head high and keep it high forevermore. I can work, work hard, and," he faltered, "there is a reason why I must make myself very sure; why I must find a way back to the man I once was."

Millington was standing with his back to her, gazing into the fire. She rose and placed her hand in his.

"Yes, David, and some day you will know that you have won."

IT was the last week in January when Anne went South to join her brother. David went with her as far as the city, his first visit from the farm since the morning he had knocked at the door and asked for a meal. He rather dreaded the trip, and, after he had seen Anne safely on the train, turned with reluctant feet in the direction of the big stores. There were several purchases he needed, and as he went his way, returning glances with head held high, he was reassured. Once he met a man he had known in the days before his conviction, and the man had offered his hand without hesitation. They talked for several minutes and parted. After that a greater courage was born in David, and it was nightfall when he sought a train that would carry him home.

Millington was very busy during the absence of the woman who had come to mean so much to him. In a hundred little ways he had to take her place in the household, and it was rather with dismay that he read the letter telling him she had decided to stay longer. With her letter were a number of signed checks for him to fill out, and so pay small household bills, and the hired men. As a P. S. to her letter Anne wrote:

"On second consideration, I am sending you five extra signed checks. You may need more money in an emergency. Pay off all small bills, and use your own best judgment. As you see, I am leaving the matter entirely to you; the bank account is at your disposal."

MILLINGTON frowned when he read the letter, but hastened to do as he was bid. It was a matter of two evenings to verify them, and send out the checks. When the duty was over, other labors piled up, and almost without his knowing it Millington found that Anne's visit was over, and that the melting snow and vistas of green grass spelled the fact that spring was fast approaching.

"Brother says we will have to start spring work without him," Anne told him the morning of her return. "He'll be back in a few weeks, and I'd like to have things well under way. Do you suppose you can manage?"

"I am sure of it." There was a new ring in David's tone, and Anne's heart beat higher at the sound of it.

"I am glad you feel so sure," she said quietly, and in a manner that made Millington glance at her very quickly. Was he wrong, or was there a difference in her since her return home a few hours before? "And, Mr. Millington,"—she had been calling him David for weeks now—"unless you have some other work you want to do this morning, cannot we go over the accounts—check things up for the period of time I was away?"

Millington acquiesced quickly. With pad and pencil he made his explanations, and when he had finished he handed Anne two unused signed checks.

"And that is all the money you drew," she said coldly. "There is nothing else, and no other deposits."

Millington looked at her with blank dismay. She was questioning him as if she knew that something had gone wrong—as if her mind were fully made up on her subject. Through his head ran the pain-seared thought that something might be wrong—that he might—

"Yes, that's all—all that happened. Don't you see—there are receipts—and the voucher slips from the bank will show that my figures are right. Why—"

He faltered and stopped.

Anne did not look up. She was studying her brother's signature on the two checks.

"You don't think I'd—why, of course everything is all right. I know it is. I never even thought of touching a penny that didn't belong to me. Everything is quite all right."

David stepped back, and was standing with his head high, anger flashing from his eyes. His clenched fists told of his emotion.

Slowly Anne lifted her head.

"David, I know everything is all right. I never doubted it for a minute; only I wanted to show you that it was right." A smile broke over her face; she moved near him. "Don't you see, David, that you never even for a minute thought of doing anything wrong? You trusted yourself because you did not remember any distrust. You were angry because I doubted you. I tried to show you that you had as much faith in yourself as I had in you. You big boy, you! I knew that you'd win!"

Millington stood looking at her for several minutes.

"You knew—you planned all the time—to show me that I could trust myself as you trusted me?"

"Yes, David; I wanted you to be sure."

For a space of time they were silent.

"You want me to be sure; you cared; because you know I loved you—because—"

A blinding mist seemed to shut out the world. In this moment when he was free to tell Anne of his all-engulfing love, his lips were hushed with the wonder of it all. His groping hands found her and drew her to him. He looked down on her, and her eyes smiled up at him, seeming as twin stars to light his way to love and faith.

Happy Letters

By GEORGE HYMAN, Chaplain 326th Infantry

I AM deeply interested in the men of our Regiment. You are, at least, interested in one. I am writing this letter to suggest a very important thing which will help to make our Army better, the men more contented, and also bring about more happiness in the home folks. In all the "Y" buildings you can see the sign, "Have you written to mother?" This encouragement is given them, not so much for the good that it will do to the home folks, but because we want the men to receive letters in reply to those they write. We encourage the men to write the pleasant, happy things. This letter is to ask you to write of pleasant things in response to their letters.

Captain H. H. Pearson, of the Canadian Army, says: "Tell the women of America to write letters to their men at the front—and then more letters. It's home letters that hold the front-line trenches. If you have a relative or friend at the front, write to him often."

Lieutenant Aleide Picard, Thirteenth

French Infantry, says: "What kind of letters should the home folks write to the soldier at the front? Literary quality isn't the thing most needful in them, of course. Perhaps the best of them all are the ones packed full of little homely details—accounts of the new neighbors across the street and of the words the baby has learned to say, and of how Jimmy is growing out of all his clothes and getting to look more like his daddy each day—and if he just grows up to be half so good a man, it will be all right. These are the letters that are oftenest re-read by the soldier before he goes over the top—just commonplace letters that tell of everyday happenings back home, and of the love and trust that are in keeping for him there."

Certain types of letters ought never to be sent to the men at the front. One is that written by the selfish or thoughtless woman whose closely written pages are blurred with her tears and taken up with her own sorrow in having her soldier so far from home, and her plea to him to come back at once.

Harold R. Peat, "Private Peat," writes in the current issue of the American Magazine to the mothers in America:

"Send your boy off with a smile. It will make you a comrade to him and an example as well. He will say to himself:

"Well, if mother could buck up and meet her trouble with a smile, I guess I can, too."

"And when you write to him—and write often—don't send him 'sorry' letters. Don't moan and tell all the black things you think about. Make him feel that you are in the fight with him; that you are proud and happy about him. If he thinks you understand, he will be proud and happy himself.

"Oh, those letters that come to the trenches! You don't know, you can't know what they mean to us. No matter what we are doing, everything stops when the sergeant comes around with the mail. Maybe he hands you a parcel. That's fine—but it can wait. It's a letter you want! Words that you can imagine you hear your mother saying. For it's mother that counts first with the boys in the trenches."

When you receive this letter from me, won't you write your loved one here an encouraging, happy letter? It will mean a great deal to him as a soldier and more as a manly man. Don't tell him blue things. Tell him happy things. Say to him, "Be a man and do your best." The Commanding Officer, as well as every other officer in the Regiment, shows interest daily in the welfare of the men.

Our Women Overseas and What They Wear

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT was at a formal reception that I first saw a young girl in the olive drab uniform of her country. She stood out distinctively from the throngs of other women in their fluffy summer gowns—so distinctively that I turned with a question to my escort.

"Who do you suppose she is?" I questioned, "and what do you suppose she does?"

"She is a member of the Woman's Motor Corps of America," came the answer. "You'll see a good many of them about the city nowadays. If you were in France you'd see them there, too. They have volunteered to act as chauffeurs—they drive officers' cars, ambulances and buses (they're ready, in fact, to obey any orders that have to do with a motor, even to the mechanical side of it), and their uniform is just as much a part of their position as any soldier's uniform would be."

Somehow one seldom stops to think of the women war workers in uniform. One recognizes vaguely that there are many women whose patriotic work should be distinguished by a certain form of dress, but a great number of people do not know that that dress has been standardized. They do not realize that the women in various branches of the service wear uniforms that are as individual as the blue of our sailor boys and the khaki of our land army.

BOTH the United States Army nurses and the Red Cross nurses wear dark blue suits with "U. S." on their collars. The army nurses also have the insignia of the Medical Corps, and the other group of nurses have a blue brassard on their sleeve, with red letters spelling across it, "The American Red Cross." Our women doctors—and there are many of them in the service—wear khaki-colored serge suits with the insignia of the Medical Corps on their coat lapels and on the front of their service hats. The women who work for the Red Cross, though not the nurses, wear an official uniform with the veil headdress that is now so well known.

The Signal Corps is sending women to France, many of them in the rôle of telephone operators. A third group of operators is being prepared for duty overseas, and the first two units are now working not far from our battle lines. They wear a uniform of dark blue with the crossed flags of the Signal Corps on collar and hat. They also wear a brassard on the sleeve, on which is embroidered a telephone receiver.

The Salvation Army has found many opportunities for service abroad. Of course their work is not very different from that of the Y. W. C. A., but their training makes them peculiarly fitted for practical army positions. Many of them have been invaluable in the running of canteens and similar lines of work, and several have been mentioned in the newspapers, lately as sticking pluckily to their posts under shell fire. Their uniform is of khaki material with an insert of red on the shoulder bearing the words "The Salvation Army." The same words are printed in red on a white band that they wear around their campaign hats.

PERHAPS the most attractive uniform I have seen worn by a woman is the uniform that I first saw—that of the Woman's Motor Corps. They wear smart tailored khaki suits, of a cut that is very boyish and quite military, with a Sam Brown belt and a small cap. Our women overseas! They're a brave army—braver than we can realize. And now that they wear uniforms authorized by the United States government, we feel that their bravery has been recognized—they have been classed, and fairly, with any other soldier who wears a uniform. For they are soldiers—soldiers whose work will take them into very real danger, which they will meet with the smiling courage that is typical of American women.

The woman in uniform should be a welcome sight—particularly to mothers who are worrying because their boys are far from home and the gentle influences of home. To know that there are women with steady fast souls, and loving hearts, and kind hands near every firing line should bring comfort, and a very real sort of comfort, to them. And the women who wear the uniform of the United States government are that sort of women—the sort who will inspire boys in a far land to do their tasks well, and—most important of all—the sort who will keep alive the ideals of home and of chivalry. The woman in uniform is the one link that draws a hearth fire near to a bleak battle field.

AND so, when you see a woman in uniform, know that she is doing a big work in a worth-while spirit. Don't think that the uniform is an affectation; that she is playing at a game that men are dying for; because she isn't. She is serving her country in the way her country most needs, and her uniform, (like that of her brother in arms,) is one of the marks of her service.

Adventures in Neighboring

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

JUST what, fellow Adventurers, are you going to do this summer to keep your communities wholesome and sane and wide awake? Nothing in particular? Ah, but you must! For this summer (really our first in the War) is going to test the fiber of the American people. Either we will sink into selfish self-absorption and brood over the war; or else we will devote every moment to making our neighborhood brighter and happier and more of a credit to the nation, so that when our "boys" do come back victorious, they will find their home towns better and cleaner and more progressive, more nobly American, than when they went away.

Here is a heroic battle in which we can all engage—even to the littlest boy and girl among us. If we can't wield a gun, we can a hoe or a broom or a washrag. We can clean our streets, and mend our fences, and freshen our homes. We can banish the blues, and smile even if it be through tears. We can cherish the old folks. We can sing around the piano at night. We can forbid pessimism of every sort. In all our leisure hours we can spread the gospel of "a nobler United States," and put our preaching into practice by cleaning up our own little corner of it.

This done, we can write to our dear ones in France with a clear conscience, filling our letters with such noble purposes and plans that our messages will be like angel visitants strengthening the hearts of our "boys," clarifying their vision, embuing them with new love of home and with fresh determination to fight for it.

This, dear neighbors, is the principal job of us stay-at-homes. The ark of American ideals is in our hands. And I know that we are not going to prove false to our trust. I know that the letters that wing their way to France this coming summer are going to glow with such glorious optimism and good tidings of home that the American soldier, standing over there in a rat-infested trench, perhaps knee-deep in water, with shells bursting uncomfortably close will smile and tuck our letters in next to his heart, knowing that the home folks are "with him" and doing their very utmost to keep the old town cheerful and abreast of the times.

Some of you are "right on the job" now. I get many fine letters from plucky men and women who, immediately after the first batch of lads left town to join the colors, began to counteract the inevitable slump. New interests were started; Red Cross chapters and patriotic clubs formed; inexpensive celebrations gotten up. Thus morbidity was driven out and life kept wholesome and bright.

IF your community is facing such a slump, neighbors, read the following earnest and dynamic accounts of how other towns and villages are meeting this problem.

A War-Time Community Club

In these war days, few rural communities feel able to afford a highly organized, expensive community club; but I think any community could have one like ours.

Our club represents twelve families; has a president, secretary and treasurer, and meets once a month at some one's home, each of the twelve families entertaining the club once during the year. Our dues are five cents a meeting for every member.

We meet always at nine o'clock in the morning and do Red Cross work until twelve, when dinner is served. This dinner is kept plain and inexpensive—the kind of meal approved of by the government and easy for a farm woman to get.

At one o'clock we commence our program, which has been previously arranged by one of the members. First there is roll call; then the minutes of the last meeting; then a song (from a Community Song Book), which is usually a national air; then the topic of the day. Every meeting this topic is different. We have had, as topics, "War: Past and Present"; "Great Men"; "Modern War Implements"; "France and our Duty to Her"; "Characters in the Bible"; and many others. We have had papers on everything connected with house-keeping, from garret to cellar, including an exchange of war recipes. Sometimes we are called upon to read or recite poems, and as one of our rules is "Do cheerfully what you are asked to do," we go at the task. By doing this, we have all grown broader and more earnest and gotten a better vision of life.

Then, too, the practical results have been many. We have done a lot of Red Cross work; have sent a box valued at thirty dollars to the charity ward of our hospital; have sent flowers to the sick; helped the poor, and sent a considerable sum of money to the Red Cross fund. Had we not been a club, we, as individuals, would never have thought of doing all these things. But being united and having a little treasury, we are able to. We call our club "Good Cheer," and it is living up to its name.

MARY A. JOHNSTON.

Can you imagine, dear neighbors, with what joy I open letters such as that one sent from Alabama? From every one of those twelve families, no doubt, some son, husband or brother has gone to the war. But has this been regarded as a cause for self-pity or "the blues"? Not a bit of it! Instead, it has awakened the finest sort of national spirit in those left at home.

HERE is another instance of community betterment which should reach the ears of the "soldier boys" from this town on the Yellowstone River:

Drinking Fountains for Town

The town of G— lies on the Yellowstone River, at the foot of a hill known as "Hungry Joe." It has six thousand inhabitants. There is an immense amount of business transacted in it, for it is a railroad division point, also a shipping point East for stock, wool and grain. So there are men, teams and dogs constantly coming and going. Recently it had but one hotel (which was equipped with a bar), many private boarding-houses, and some rooming-houses. But there was virtually no place for a man to get a drink of water except at a saloon. The W. C. T. U. women saw this state of affairs and regretted it so much that finally some one suggested that a few entertainments and suppers be given, the proceeds to be used to purchase a drinking fountain.

The women set to work, and the result was that they bought three fountains, instead of one. These were a bubbling fountain (with a lower basin for dogs) which they placed in front of the post office; an even larger fountain (also for man and beast) which was placed on the court house lawn; and last, but not least, an ornamental fountain for the center of a "flatiron" enclosure, which stood where three streets came together.

This enclosure had always been an eyesore. So the women had the ground spaded up and seeded to grass and flowers—which the spray from the fountain kept beautiful. Arbor Day exercises were held here, and the children planted trees about this little park. So it became a delight to every one who entered the town.

A MONTANA NEIGHBOR.

That vivid account reminds me of a similar "park" I saw last summer in a little city on the Canadian prairies. It was late in August, and I had been sitting for hours in a dusty train, almost choked. The prairies were bare and brown. The eye hungered for something green. And then I stepped from the train at Lethbridge, and my glance lit on a public square that was cool and green and filled with flowers—great glowing banks of them. I wanted to run out and kneel down and hug an armful of them to me. You know how it is. And no doubt a returning soldier boy would feel even more keenly about it. I think he would prefer that welcome to a brass band.

And even if your soldier is not apt to be home this summer to see what you are doing for your town—his town—he will love to hear all about it when you write him. The only pity will be: your having nothing of the sort to tell him.

I'M wondering how many of you will have an inspiring bit of news like this to send him about his little brothers back home:

A Little Boys' Club

Most of the boys of our neighborhood played marbles for keeps and spent their time on the street; things I did not want my boy to do. So one day I gathered all the boys at my house and talked with them, explaining the evil of gambling and showing them that they were taking the first steps toward it. Then I helped them to form themselves into a club, my only suggestion being that we mothers be considered "honorary members" and be taken into the secrets of the club.

The boys readily agreed to this, and proceeded to map out their work. They had in their pledge never to allow strong drink to pass their lips, never to use tobacco or to utter vile or profane language. They met twice a week, studied parliamentary rules for half an hour, listened to a good story, played a game, and left for their homes at nine o'clock. Once every month they had a program and "banquet," to which the mothers were invited.

One of these boys had a brother who was considered a hard character. He wished to join the club. I was fearful of his influence, so I asked the boys if they thought they could be firm enough in the right not to allow him to change their views. They talked the matter over, and finally decided they would admit this boy and see if they could not help him. He was voted in, came to the next meeting, and from that time was present regularly. He enjoyed the reading very much, and asked the privilege of coming over to my house to listen to reading for an hour three evenings in the week. I gladly consented, with the result that he was there four evenings instead of one. It was understood that he should leave for home at nine o'clock and have a little talk with his mother before going to bed.

In the spring this boy suggested that the club rent a lot and put in a garden. I had an acre of ground, so told them if they meant business they could have the use of my lot. But I insisted they must work before and after school, and on Saturdays. They were decidedly in earnest, and it would have done the heart of any loving mother good to see those boys at their work. They were loyal and faithful, and netted quite a sum of money, which was divided between them.

If this should be interesting to my Christian Herald neighbors, I would be glad to tell them, later, how this little club became the nucleus of a much larger club for young men.

Before closing I should like to add that the unruly boy completely straightened out, becoming a great comfort to his mother and one whom we all loved.

C. S. C.

To those of you who love and understand boys—the pitfalls all around them and the need of our guidance and interest in all their affairs—I need not recommend this manly "club" of Oregon lads. For I know that by now many of you have decided: "That's just what the boys of my neighborhood need!" and have begun to plan how you can get a similar club started.

A House That Neighbors Built

You are all familiar with the story of "the house that Jack built." But I wish to tell you of a house that neighbors built, in a small town in the South.

It was obvious to this community that if a certain family only had a home, they could be self-supporting; while, as it was, every cent they earned went for rent.

Two kind, practical men took the matter up and evolved a plan whereby such a home could be made by small contributions, no burden being placed on any one. Personal calls were begun, and help solicited; consisting of money, material or labor. So hearty was the response that within a month a lot was purchased; then a three-room house with two porches was erected, outhouses for cow and chickens were built, a garden fenced, and a well bored, with windlass set up. Good material was used—concrete foundation, and brick flue and chimney. The lot had been set in fruit trees when bought, so there was a ready-made orchard. And when the painter was through with the buildings, an insurance agent gave a three-year policy in case of fire. Every bit of the labor was voluntary work.

The most eager helpers, however, were the men who went in wagons to move the family home. The matter had been kept secret from them, and you can imagine their surprise and joy! They were a little black-eyed widow and three children, whom misfortune had pursued relentlessly for many sad months. In their new home they were very happy, and this made it all immensely worth while.

Now this didn't happen just before Thanksgiving or Christmas, but during the blazing hot days of midsummer, when "sunny" Tennessee was a burning reality.

Do you not think it was a right neighborly action?

Mrs. M. S. D.

I WILL leave you to answer that question, while I hurry on to our next "adventure in neighboring"—the last we shall have room for today. For this I have chosen a community "lark," since we must have relaxation as well as earnest endeavor, if our little corner of the world is to be kept sweet and wholesome.

A Community "Good Time"

"We don't get together enough," declared one of the village men to me last summer. "Each church has its picnic, and the schools have one; but all of us, regardless of age, sex or religion, ought to get together once in a while." I agreed, and told him so.

So I was not surprised when, a few days later, the party-line phone rang and this word was passed along: "Mr.— asks every one to bring a lunch and come to his cottage at Lake — (some six miles away) next Saturday. He will provide coffee and lemonade, and everything at the cottage will be at the disposal of the neighborhood. This word was circulated throughout our village and to every farm house within its radius.

And people came! The novelty of an open house for everybody—rich or poor, thrifty or shiftless, hired man or minister, young and old—appealed to all. A hayload was made up in the village, and autos, carriages, bicycles, wagons—every sort of vehicle—moved lake-ward on the morning designated. We had never had such a varied gathering of local people.

The cottage was open to us all, so the women took possession of the kitchen, the men and boys of the boats and fishing lines and the mothers and babies of the broad veranda, with its view of lake and hills. Every one was in the highest spirits. Old friends, who (although living not many miles apart) had been too busy to call, were greeting one another for the first time in months; some fairly near neighbors were just becoming acquainted and the new neighbors were beginning to feel less strange.

After dinner the victrola furnished entertainment for a while, and then impromptu games were played. After this we were asked to speak on anything we felt would interest the gathering. The response was remarkable. First, the needs of our local library were presented by the librarian to a much more representative audience than she could possibly have obtained at a meeting called for the purpose; and afterward there were talks on the condition of the crops, the value of various fertilizers, and so on. This was followed by more boating, some singing, and an early start for home before milking time. And every one declared that our gathering that day had been the most successful ever held in our community.

RUTH RHODES.

This, dear neighbors, brings our meeting to an end, except for the Forum, which follows. It is my hope and prayer that this little page of ours, dropping down like a comforting thought into some war-anxious village out West, or down South, or up North, will carry with it the loving message there is in my heart for all of you: the conviction that if we stay-at-homes (with dear ones across the sea) will only strive to forget ourselves in planning for our towns, and sharing these plans with our home-hungry boys "Over There," this time of waiting and separation can be a glory and triumph instead of a sorrow and trial.

The Neighbors' Forum

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD NEIGHBORS: I have a class of six girls, ages 11 to 14 years, in our Sunday school. I should like some suggestions as to how to keep them interested and awaken in them a sense of duty toward the church.

W. H. C.

DEAR NEIGHBORS: I want a letter party for my birthday which comes on May 20. You don't know how much pleasure it would give to one who lives away out in the country. If you don't see this request until after the 20th, write to me anyway.

MISS A. E. ATKINSON.

I would like the address of a Confederate Veteran, to cheer him up, for the sake of my dear old dad, who "went home" last month.

MISS F.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: Will you please send me several copies of your plan for organizing Local Community Clubs? I think I will be able to get several clubs started in the towns near here.

Uplift Work in the Camps

THE Federal government has pledged its word that so far as care and vigilance can accomplish the results, the men committed to its care will be returned to the homes and communities that so generously gave them with no scars except those won in honorable conflict. The career to which we are calling our young men in the defense of democracy must be made an asset to them, not only in strengthened and more virile bodies as a result of physical training, not only in minds deepened and enriched by participation in a great and heroic enterprise, but in the enhanced spiritual value which comes from a full life lived well and wholesomely.

SO writes President Wilson in reference to the task of the War and Navy Departments' Commissions on Training Camp Activities. His statement in full appears in "Keeping Our Fighters Fit—For War and After," written by Edward Frank Allen in cooperation with Raymond B. Fosdick, chairman of these twin Commissions.

The book is an official description of just how Uncle Sam is solving the problem of entertainment, music, athletics, social activities, and other diversions for the men in service. It is official, but it is human, entertaining, told in a most unofficial way, and illustrated with photographs from many camps.

With a hundred thousand men a month coming into the camps by the new draft, there is ever increasing interest in how the soldiers and sailors spend their leisure time; how they while away the evening hours; what they do on Sundays. It is generally known that there is organized music in the camps, but in the chapter, "The Fighters Who Sing," one gets the exalting effect of 5,000 voices lifted up in "Glory, Glory, Hallelujah!" And that music promotes military as well as social team-work is admirably illustrated in the following:

The song-leader had a small motor car with space in the back for a folding organ, which enabled him to carry his work to the men in whatever part of the camp they happened to be. He had, moreover, a number of white oilcloth charts on which were lettered the words of the most popular songs.

One afternoon on a trip through the camp he noticed about forty men pulling stumps. He saw at a glance that they were tired, dog-tired, in fact. Drawing up his ear at the side of the road he held a hurried conversation with the officer in charge. The officer was heard to say, "By all means, try it."

So the song-leader unrolled his charts and hung them on the side of the flivver, told the men to sit down on the stumps they had been pulling, gave a chord or two on the little organ, and suggested that they sing "Yaaka Hula Hickey Dula." They did. It began a trifle languidly, but the volume picked up after the first line, and they repeated the chorus twice. This was followed by that modern classic, "Keep Your Head Down, Allemand." They fairly bawled it out. The transition from lassitude to energy was marked and sudden. They didn't want to stop. . . . They went back to their work, but they yanked out the stumps with a vigor that they had lacked before. And from the distance the song-leader heard them singing: . . . "Pull away, pull away, the victor's ours."

A MILLION books are in circulation among the men in forty camps and training stations. The American soldier of today reads a higher class of books than the average American citizen. There is a demand for books on war strategy, calculus, civil engineering, and literary classics, and technical handbooks; but our soldier is no highbrow, and there is a corresponding demand at the other end of the scale for Henty books and the like. Similarly, educational work covers a wide field in meeting the demands of men gathered in from all walks of life in the draft.

"Some of them speak and write the King's English; some alas, the Kaiser's German, but with strong American accent; and others anything from Russian dialect to Chinese."

English for non-English-speaking foreigners is for the most part compulsory. In such sentences as "I am a soldier of America; I am fighting for democracy; democracy is the rule of the people," the new citizens learn both the language of the country and the meaning of its privileges. The men are appealed to through their love of home to learn to write letters. Then there is French. In some camps it is compulsory, but in them all it is popular. At Camp Wadsworth, recently, it was found that ninety-two per cent. of the men wanted it. Other foreign languages are being taught in the camps also.

AMONG other "non-military" necessities allowed for by the government are many opportunities for contact with the kind of influences the men have been accustomed to at home. For in these is amelioration for the dull pangs of homesickness. There is the "He-Man" there. He acts as guide, philosopher and friend. In his position as secretary in any one of the Y. M. C. A., Knights of Columbus, or Jewish Welfare buildings, his opportunities are unlimited. "He may write a letter for an illiterate, or engage in an impromptu debate with a college undergraduate as to the relative merits of Ibsen and Shaw; he may lead a Bible class or referee a boxing-match. He must be a good mixer first and last. . . ."

There are many reasons for these men becoming known as Big Brothers to the men in camp. They have mastered the art of personal service, these men, they know the personal likes and dislikes of the soldiers and sailors, and minister to them in surprising ways. But it is the Hostess House of the Y. W. C. A. that does most to "Keep the home fires burning." Here is an astonishing military discovery. "When from 30,000 to 60,000 men are gathered together in a training camp or station where discipline of necessity disregards the individual, and where each man is but a cog in the machinery of warfare, there is nothing on earth most of them want so much as to see their families and friends. A comfortable, cheerful spot where they may go and spend their time off with mothers, wives or sweethearts has given a new meaning to life for them. After such a visit the boy goes back to the discipline of his man-made world with a new courage and a new readiness to do his whole duty."

"The Hostess House," says Lieutenant-Colonel Reille, sent here by the French government in connection with teaching our soldiers trench warfare, "would help to solve a big difficulty on the other side. And I feel that it is going to be one of the ways in which our new Allies will help us." The Hostess House is furnishing the home life in camp. The War Camp Community Service is furnishing it for the men on leave. Mr. Allen has shown throughout the chapters devoted to the various branches of the Commissions' work how the government is offering every incentive to the men to lead clean, wholesome, normal lives. The idea, as set forth by Mr. Fosdick, is to make their everyday life so attractive that there would be no place for vice.

The subject of the influence of vice, disease and alcohol upon the fighting efficiency of armies in the past has not been avoided. Within six weeks after the United States had entered the war, Congress enacted under a special law provisions whereby prostitution and liquor were absolutely forbidden within military environs, and prohibiting the sale of liquor to uniformed men anywhere. The War Department expected the fullest cooperation of local communities in carrying out this law—not only the letter of it, but the spirit as well. The Law Enforcement Division of the Commissions, aided by representatives of the Department of Justice, the Army and Navy Intelligence Departments, and other agencies, were assigned this work. They sent men into the field to check up on the situation and follow up on it where the law was not being enforced. A few localities failed utterly to take the situation seriously. And wherever drastic action has been necessary, the government has taken it without hesitation.

"The war must be won by manpower," Secretary Baker has said. "The whole work of the Commissions on Training Camp Activities has looked toward the creation of fighters one hundred per cent. efficient."

A "MUST" of EVERY PURCHASE

You are being asked to pay more for many things.

Raw material, labor, everything, costs more. Manufacturers must get more for their products or deteriorate quality.

Most manufacturers have chosen to raise prices, rather than lower standards, rather than sell inferior goods.

Their advertising has educated you to expect a certain grade of excellence—and that excellence must be maintained. They must keep faith with you or lose the good-will investment their advertising has built up. This is how advertising protects you, the buyer.

When you buy advertised goods you get uniform and dependable quality. When you buy goods advertised in CHRISTIAN HERALD you go a step farther. Your satisfaction is a "must" of every purchase.

Marion Harland's Corner

Our Letter-Box

THE first letter that comes to our hand today may be set down as a model, albeit the writer is a young housewife. It answers a request that appeared here a fortnight or so ago, for recipes for Wheatless Rye Muffins, enclosing two the writer has tried and found good. She adds a kindly word for fellow Cornerites, and having done her errand of charity and good-will, makes room for others. We commend her and other young learners in our Corner school to the good-will of their seniors. As I said a while ago, we would make the Corner a veritable Housewife's Exchange of practical experiences and the expression of common needs:

"I am enclosing two recipes for Rye Muffins for the corner. They are easy to make and very good. There is no wheat flour in either and no eggs in one of them. They are both delicious."

"I hope some of the other housewives will be able to use them and find them helpful."

Rye Muffins—No. 1

2 cups rye flour;
4 teaspoons baking powder;
½ teaspoon salt;
2 tablespoons shortening (melted);
2 tablespoons brown sugar;
1½ cups milk;
1 egg.

Put the flour, baking powder, salt and sugar into a bowl, add the milk, melted shortening and beaten egg; mix thoroughly. Brush iron muffin or gem pans with lard, put a spoonful of the mixture into each. Bake in hot oven from 20 to 30 minutes.

Rye Muffins—No. 2

2 cups rye flour;
2 cups milk;
4 teaspoons baking powder;
½ teaspoon salt;
4 teaspoons sugar;
2 tablespoons shortening.

Mix [the rye flour, baking powder, salt, and sugar, add the milk and melted shortening; mix well. Brush muffin pans with lard, put a spoonful of the mixture in each. Bake in hot oven from 15 to 25 minutes.

MARGARET C., Long Island.

the milled meal with removed germ and fine and 'soggy.' We are properly appreciating this fact. Could you not suggest it to other communities?

"7. My chief query is, how to make an acceptable loaf in lightness and digestibility of something besides wheat that shall not be of corn and what to put with corn as we now put in some fine flour and graham in our steamed loaves?"—Mrs. D. M. D. H., New York.

1. Taking it for granted that the supply of rye flour in every market now equals the demand, we have answered your first and second query already by the insertion in the Corner of recipes based upon this product, and advising the use of rice and eggs to bring the dough into a comely and wholesome form. We have also given directions for making the old-fashioned rye-and-Indian loaf beloved of our grandparents. Cornerites are invited to add suggestions that will make easier a "situation" which is embarrassing hundreds of intelligent and patriotic women.

3. Does this recipe fill the measure of your fancied recollection of the (misnamed) "buckwheat johnnycake"? Allow me to remark, in passing, that the simon pure "johnnies" were made of cornmeal.

Sour Milk Buckwheat Cakes

Two cups of buckwheat flour and half a cup of Indian meal, sifted together three times with an even teaspoonful of salt and a rounded teaspoonful of baking-soda. Two cups of lopped milk, or buttermilk, half a cup of warm (not hot) water, and a large tablespoonful of molasses.

Mix the milk, warm water and molasses together and sift the buckwheat, meal, salt and soda into a large bowl. Make a hollow in the center of this and stir into the flour, etc., the mixed milk, water and molasses. Beat up very quickly, but thoroughly, and bake upon a hot griddle. A soapstone griddle is the best for all "griddles," requiring no greasing. Your cakes are thus "baked," not fried, as when cooked upon a greasy surface.

4. "Gluten," as defined by the encyclopedia, is "the nitrogenous part of the flour of wheat and other grains which is insoluble in water." We have scores of chemists among our correspondents. We appeal to them for information respecting "the other grains" here referred to. Meanwhile, a practical hint from an up-to-date housewife may relieve somewhat the present distress. She says, "I mix with three cups of cornmeal half a cup of oatmeal porridge, cooked to a jelly as you advise. It is rich in gluten."

5. I have already recommended a "potato sponge" as the best foundation for "risen bread" of which I have any knowledge.

6. I let no opportunity pass without recommending the "water-ground meal" of the South in preference to the 'bolted' products of Northern mills. This is undoubtedly the same as that turned out from your "set of stones."

7. After long and mature deliberation, I have decided to refer the chief query of the list to a Committee of the Whole. In every-day parlance, to our goodly company of working housewives.

Given the two sections of the task—(1) Law, founded upon patriotic necessity, forbids us to use wheat flour except in small quantities, so small that the limitation may be said to be absolute. (2) A cultivated palate and knowledge of hygienic laws make the "loaf acceptable in lightness and digestibility" a daily necessity in the family bill of fare. If this reminds the reader of the ancient "poser" of the "irresistible force encountering an immovable body," we need not wonder. Who will serve her generation and all faithful Cornerites by sending in a recipe for a loaf that will meet the stated requirements?

I do not speak inadvisedly in declaring that the woman who undertakes the experiment and carries it through successfully will be worthy of a high seat in our Exchange.

Let us have the results of trial and the news of victory.

Jesus on the Cross

International Sunday School Lesson for June 16. Mark 15: 1-47

Christ Dying for Our Sins

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE Gospel of Mark moves on swiftly to its sublime climax. The arrest of Jesus had been made by the temple authorities, and they brought Jesus to a night session of the Sanhedrin. Strictly speaking, this was illegal, so the full body reconvened early in the morning to make a political case, in order to get a death penalty, which was beyond their power. In the night they had condemned him for blasphemy, but the government would not act on that ground, so they now charge him with treason. Mark, with customary brevity, tells nothing of the attempt of Pilate to shift the responsibility to Herod. He greatly abbreviates even the trial before Pilate. But we get the clear impression that the governor was well acquainted with the character of the priests, and that at no time did he give serious credence to the accusation they had brought. In fact, in a weak-willed, half-hearted way, he wanted to save Jesus from suffering so horrible a fate as they had planned. Meantime the Nazarene, after calmly reasserting his Messianic claim, refused to make any further response to his accusers. Pilate knew the charges to be unfounded. Jesus felt that his life and teachings were sufficient refutation.

The Choice of Barabbas

Barabbas was guilty of exactly the thing that the priests charged against Jesus: insurrection and rebellion. Pilate sneered openly at their hypocrisy in accusing Jesus of raising a revolt against Rome, and then calling for the release of another political prisoner charged with the same offense. Pilate had understood Jesus to be popular with the people, and expected to have him claimed for release, as it was the custom to please the populace by discharging some offender at the Passover season. But the fickle crowd was easily swayed by the emissaries of the priesthood to choose Barabbas, who had openly and murderously defied Rome. Once more the purely spiritual nature of Jesus' Kingdom caused the people to turn against him. They had been disappointed in his failure to seize temporal power. Perhaps the Triumphal Entry had aroused false hopes.

Even now, Pilate thought to release Barabbas and also to drop the case against Jesus. But his unguarded question, "What then shall I do unto him whom ye call king of the Jews?" was met with unexpected clamor to crucify him. At last Pilate thought it good policy to accede. Such cases were usually decided by considerations of policy, rather than justice, by Roman provincial rulers, just as today German militarism acts on policy instead of principle.

Choosing Barabbas accounts for Jerusalem's fall and destruction. There were always two Jerusalems, the Jerusalem of the prophets and idealists and the Jerusalem of the priests and politicians. Her true and sublime sphere was that of the spirit, but the earthly element at last dragged her down.

As for Pilate, he stands forever pilloried before the ages, giving innocence and truth to be brutally sacrificed to please the crafty and the ignorant.

The Mockery and Crucifixion

The soldiers had heard a garbled version of the story of the prisoner, and now they read the inscription for his cross. They found in it occasion for rude sport. Weakened physically by the terrible scourging, Jesus was unable to carry his cross as was the gruesome custom. So the soldiery rudely impressed a passer-by, one Simon, whose sons were afterward well-known Christians. At last they reached the hill called Golgotha. There the rough crossed timbers were laid on the ground, and the bleeding Sufferer placed upon it, spiked through hands and feet. Then all was raised up and the foot of the cross set in a hole previously dug, the whole weight of the body resting upon four gaping wounds. Christ refused the stupefying drink. He wanted to be clear-visioned. He had still something to say, something to undergo.

Then came the clamor of taunts against the Miracle-Worker. Now was the time for him to do something really worth while! The chief priests' scornful word of mockery enshrines the sublime truth: "He saved others, himself he cannot save." This is true of all real givers of themselves in service, and Christ's miracles were always for others, never for himself. He spurned the Satanic suggestion of using his powers for himself at the very outset of his ministry (Matt. 4). Besides, he would not take advantage of anything which men, his brothers, could not also enjoy. If others must sacrifice all to obey God, so will he sacrifice to the uttermost. If others must take the awful risks of unselfishness in a world of sin and suffering, so will he. If others must die for faith and not be delivered, he will not deliver himself.

The Sufferings of Christ

Who can attempt to put into adequate words the agony of that heart of love at such an end as this for all his unfailing ministry to human need? In that hour there was wrung from his lips that awful cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Notice that even here Jesus instinctively quoted the words of Scripture, and from a psalm which he must often have pondered. God had not forsaken Jesus. At that very moment the Father was bending over the Son in supreme love and appreciation. "God never yet forsook at need the soul that trusted him indeed." God never forsook his Son in whom he was reconciling men to himself. But Jesus shared all our human woe, even to sharing the experience of feeling ourselves forsaken of God. In the darkness of that misery, Jesus repeated the familiar psalm as, for one black moment, the face of his Father was veiled by the anguish of body and spirit.

What Jesus Accomplished for Us There

How shall we describe the Cross of Christ? It is the supreme revelation of the heart of God himself. It is the supreme manifestation of God's will in a human life—absolute obedience. It is the supreme demonstration of the world's sin and sinfulness.

Dr. Rauschenbusch well describes the six great common sins of society, the organized forms of that selfishness wherein sin consists, which then and now rise up against the spirit of Jesus and will have none of him. They are religious bigotry, political graft, corrupt administration of law, mob violence, militarism and class spirit. There is no place in the world where you cannot witness one or other of these at work in antagonism to the Kingdom of God among men. The more you think of them, the more plainly you can classify the individual sins of the enemies of Jesus then, and the individual sins of men now, under one or another of these heads. Every one who participates in these things rejects Christ and crucifies the Son of God afresh. No one can look at the cross of Jesus understandingly without being convicted in his own soul. The sin of the world, which rose up in vindictive hatred against that spotless One, is our sin, my sin, and your sin, too.

But what power his death gives to the redeeming love of God! That cross makes the divine real and near and helpful and efficacious to the most ignorant or the most sinful. It is not that his death is apart from and different from his life. But it is the very summary and epitome of all that he said, and all he did, and all he was. It is all passing strange to the worldly mind; but the mind of faith has always centered unerringly on the cross as the place where the message of grace was most effectually revealed.

And how that cross does away with any slavish, legalistic, time-serving attempts to earn our own salvation! Impossible task! How humble and teachable it makes us, making our hearts as those of little children and thereby enabling us to enter into the mysteries of the Kingdom! Then, as we kneel in reverent humility, what a radiance streams from Calvary! It illuminates all of the Master's teaching about the Kingdom of God and his righteousness. We find his gracious glorious Spirit, and no longer stumble stupidly over the letter here and there.

Finally, in ways not to be expressed, it adds the requisite element of power to enter into that Kingdom of his. Still, as Paul wrote to the Corinthians in the first Christian generation, "the preaching of the cross is to them that are perishing, foolishness; but unto us which are being saved, it is the dynamic of God." As Thomas Kelly sings in one of his sweetest songs,

The Cross—it takes our guilt away;
It holds the fainting spirit up;
It cheers with hope the gloomy day,
And sweetens every bitter cup.

It makes the coward spirit brave,
And nerves the feeble arm to fight;
It takes its terror from the grave,
And gilds the bed of death with light.

The balm of life, the cure of woe,
The measure and the pledge of love,
The sinner's refuge here below,
The angel's theme in heaven above.

Discouraged Teachers

By JAMES M. DAVIS, Secretary of the Gideons

WHAT a privilege to teach, to tell again and again the glad tidings that Jesus lives, that he loves, that he receives sinners, and died for them! What promises are ours! "Lo, I am with you always." "They that be wise (teach) shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

A dear sister had taught a class of girls for years, ranging in years from nine to twelve. She could see no results of her work, and became greatly discouraged. In such a mood she went to her superintendent, begging to be excused; that he engage for the class another teacher; that she was doing them no good.

The superintendent knew her worth, and that her labor of love was not in vain, but was bearing fruit. That same week one of her scholars, Mary, aged nine, was taken sick, and grew rapidly worse; with her father and the family physician she was taken to a city hospital. When examined, the surgeon said an operation was necessary to save her life.

Her mother was sick at home, her father was not a Christian. The surgeon said to the girl: "My dear, a light operation is necessary, and before I perform that, I must put you to sleep."

The nurse removed her clothing, put on her a little white night dress, and the child said: "I am ready, but if I am going to sleep, I must first say my prayers." The surgeon said, "Do just as you please, my dear."

Then she knelt down, clasped her tiny hands, and prayed: "O Jesus, you know where I am, that mamma is sick at home. Bless dear papa, my Sunday school teacher, this surgeon, and all for Jesus' sake."

It was too much for the father. He begged to be excused, went to his room, and falling on his knees, surrendered to God, and became an earnest Christian.

The great surgeon said, "I had not prayed for thirty years, but that night I went to my knees and begged for mercy."

The child rapidly recovered, and was taken home.

As teachers we need a fresh and oft-repeated baptism of that gracious promise, "My Word shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the things whereto I sent it."

Some day, thank God, the harvest shall be reaped; failure is impossible, and those who have taught and sowed the Word in tears, shall reap in joy.

Southern Methodists Favor Unification

By H. K. CARROLL, D.D.

THE Southern Methodist General Conference has finished its work at Atlanta, Ga., and adjourned, after a session of about two weeks. In some things it has broken away from old lines of conservatism, evidently believing that new conditions create new problems, and new problems require new measures.

The conference adopted a missionary program embracing the Americas, Asia and Africa, and it proposes to raise $7,000,000 a year to meet the demands of its world program, including $1,000,000 a year for war work. All that it does in prosecuting its campaign is to be done in harmony and cooperation with other churches.

The Conference has greatly enlarged and strengthened that body of ecclesiastical statesmen and leaders known as the College of Bishops.

By the retirement, by this conference, of three bishops—Hass, Morrison and Waterhouse—the effective force was reduced to ten, one of whom is unable at present to perform full service. It was, therefore, determined to elect six new bishops, making an active body of sixteen, the largest number the church has ever had at one time. It was further decided to place one of these bishops in the Orient, one in Africa, one in South America, and one on the Pacific Slope, leaving twelve to be distributed among as many other districts in the South. This idea of episcopal districts centering about a leading city, over which the bishop is to preside and which he is assiduously to cultivate the next four years, reporting results to the next General Conference, is new to this church, though it has been tried in the Northern body. It was not altogether acceptable to some of the older and more conservative delegates.

THE new bishops are Rev. John M. Moore; Rev. W. F. McMurtry, who has proved his executive ability by a successful administration of the affairs of the Board of Church Extension; Rev. W. V. A. Darlington, a strong pastor, presiding elder and educator; Rev. H. M. Du Bose, editor of the Quarterly Review at Nashville; Rev. W. M. Ainsworth, and Rev. James Cannon, Jr.—all men with faces set toward the future.

The Conference dealt with the request of the women that the rights enjoyed by their lay brethren should be extended to them. The women won by a good majority. The College of Bishops, however, intervened with an episcopal veto, holding that a constitutional question was involved, and the question must go to the Annual Conferences. An appeal was taken and the Conference refused to sustain the Chair. There was much feeling, and the Conference passed the measure again by a vote of 265 to 57. If three-fourths of the annual conferences approve, the legislative rule becomes immediately effective. Almost simultaneously with this action the Southern Baptist Convention took a similar step, and Baptist and Methodist women exchanged congratulations.

Methodist unification was the most important question before the Conference. The Joint Commission had overcome some of the obstacles to a complete agreement, but had not been able to adjust the Negro question. The Southern Commission, by a vote of 19 to 6, had accepted, at Savannah, the principle of limited Negro representation in the proposed General Conference, with a proviso that would automatically create a separate and independent Negro body when their number should reach 600,000. At the last meeting at St. Louis, the Northern Commission insisted on representation for the Negro Regional Conference equal to that of any white regional conference, which would increase the number of negroes in the General Conference from 26 to 44. But it was not solely a question of 26 or 44. The Southern Commissioners wanted negro representation to cease entirely and a separate and independent organization provided for the colored men. In the debate in General Conference, nearly every speaker thought unification desirable and was willing to have negotiations continued on the basis of the action of 1914, which recommended that the negro membership be formed into a separate body.

TWO remarkable speeches were made in the course of the discussion, one by Chaplain F. J. Pre'tyman, of the U. S. Senate, who thought the platform of the two churches when they do come together should be big enough, broad enough and strong enough to hold Methodists of all races, nations and peoples. The other, was by Dr. A. F. Watkins, Secretary of the Conference, who thought his church was not so broad on this question now as were the fathers of 1866-70, and he was not willing to say that there could not be unification except upon the basis of a separate negro church. He was convinced that we ought to get closer to the negro. If we can stand behind the counter and weigh out sugar, work side by side with him in the cotton field, hire our buggies to him and give him the whip and the lap-robe, need we fear contamination in helping him to an education and in giving him a spiritual uplift?

While there were speeches on the other side, the feeling for unification became so strong as the debate progressed that the minority report, which would have practically closed the doors to further negotiation, was withdrawn and the standing vote showed only 7 men preventing absolute unanimity. When, later, Dr. Wallace MacMullen, of New York, fraternal delegate from the Methodist Episcopal Church, said since the two churches were one in spirit, purpose and doctrine, they ought to be one ecclesiastically, nearly the whole Conference rose to its feet and tumultuously applauded the sentiment. There can be no question that the Conference earnestly desires unification. It has reconstituted its commission and provided for an extra session of the General Conference if an agreement before 1922 should make it necessary.

THE General Conference approved the Centenary Missionary program, which proposes to raise for foreign and home missions $7,000,000 a year for five years, beginning with 1919, $1,000,000 a year to be for war work, for which it constituted a strong commission with Bishop Lambuth at its head.

It approved a plan for the extension of the pastoral term beyond four years, where it seems desirable and when the quarterly conference so requests, and a majority of the presiding elders concurred by ballot. It approved legislation raising the educational qualifications for admission to the ministry and authorizing a campaign for six million dollars endowment for its two new universities, Emory and Southwestern and for $13,000,000 for its colleges.

The Conference gave generous attention to several addresses by colored men. Dr. Neal, a very black man, of the colored Methodist Episcopal Church, said "that though the negro may go North he will come back, and that the best advertisement of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is the colored church it organized. He spoke with such eloquence that the Conference was brought to its feet several times with cheers. Dr. Walls, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, secured a similar appreciative response. Another colored man, Dr. Gilbert, traveled with Bishop Lambuth in the Congo, acquired three native dialects while in Africa, and had so good a command of French that he wrote the Bishop's communications to the Belgian government. When the Bishop called upon the Belgian Colonial Secretary subsequently, he said the French of the letters was the best he had ever seen, except from Frenchmen and Belgians. Dr. Gilbert told the brethren of the Conference that the only difference between him and them was that he was born in "the dark of the moon."

How I Improved My Memory In One Evening

"Of course I place you! Mr. Addison Sims of Seattle.

"If I remember correctly—and I do remember correctly—Mr. Burroughs, the lumberman, introduced me to you at the luncheon of the Seattle Rotary Club three years ago in May. This is a pleasure indeed! I haven't laid eyes on you since that day. How is the grain business? And how did that amalgamation work out?"

The assurance of this speaker—in the crowded corridor of the Hotel McAlpin—compelled me to turn and look at him, though I must say it is not my usual habit to "listen in" even in a hotel lobby.

"He is David M. Roth, the most famous memory expert in the United States," said my friend Kennedy, answering my question before I could get it out. "He will show you a lot more wonderful things than that before the evening is over."

And he did.

As we went into the banquet room the toast master was introducing a long line of the guests to Mr. Roth. I got in line and when it came my turn, Mr. Roth asked, "What are your initials, Mr. Jones, and your business connection and telephone number?" Why he asked this, I learned later, when he picked out from the crowd the 60 men he had met two hours before and called each by name without a mistake. What is more, he named each man's business and telephone number, for good measure.

I won't tell you all the other amazing things this man did except to tell how he called back, without a minute's hesitation, long lists of numbers, bank clearings, prices, lot numbers, parcel post rates and anything else the guests gave him in rapid order.

When I met Mr. Roth again—which you may be sure I did the first chance I got—he rather bowled me over by saying in his quiet, modest way:

"There is nothing miraculous about my remembering anything I want to remember, whether it be names, faces, figures, facts or something I have read in a magazine.

"You can do this just as easily as I do. Anyone with an average mind can learn quickly to do exactly the same things which seem so miraculous when I do them.

"My own memory," continued Mr. Roth, "was originally very faulty. Yes it was—a really poor memory. On meeting a man I would lose his name in thirty seconds while now there are probably 10,000 men and women in the United States, many of whom I have met but once, whose names I can call instantly on meeting them."

"That is all right for you, Mr. Roth," I interrupted, "you have given years to it. But how about me?"

"Mr. Jones," he replied, "I can teach you the secret of a good memory in one evening. This is not a guess, because I have done it with thousands of pupils. In the first of seven simple lessons which I have prepared for home study, I show you the basic principle of my whole system and you will find it—not hard work as you might fear—but just like playing a fascinating game. I will prove it to you."

He didn't have to prove it. His Course did; I got it the very next day from his publishers, the Independent Corporation.

When I tackled the first lesson, I suppose I was the most surprised man in forty-eight states to find that I had learned in about one hour—how to remember a list of one hundred words so that I could call them off forward and back without a single mistake.

That first lesson stuck. And so did the other six. Read this letter from C. Louis Allen, who at 32 years is president of a million dollar corporation, the Pyrene Manufacturing Company of New York, makers of the famous fire extinguisher:

"Now that the Roth Memory Course is finished, I want to tell you how much I have enjoyed the study of this most fascinating subject. Usually these courses involve a great deal of drudgery, but this has been nothing but pure pleasure all the way through. I have derived much benefit from taking the course of instruction and feel that I shall continue to strengthen my memory. That is the best part of it. I shall be glad of an opportunity to recommend your work to my friends."

Mr. Allen didn't put it a bit too strong. The Roth Course is priceless! I can absolutely count on my memory now. I can call the name of most any man I have met before—and I am getting better all the time. I can remember any figures I wish to remember. Telephone numbers come to mind instantly, once I have filed them by Mr. Roth's easy method. Street addresses are just as easy.

The old fear of forgetting (you know what that is) has vanished. I used to be "scared stiff" on my feet—because I wasn't sure. I couldn't remember what I wanted to say.

Now I am sure of myself, and confident and "easy as an old shoe" when I get on my feet at the club, or at a banquet, or in a business meeting, or in any social gathering.

Perhaps the most enjoyable part of it all is that I have become a good conversationalist—and I used to be as silent as a sphinx when I got into a crowd of people who knew things.

Now I can call up like a flash of lightning most any fact I want right at the instant I need it most. I used to think a "hair trigger" memory belonged only to the prodigy and genius. Now I see that every man of us has that kind of a memory if he only knows how to make it work right.

I tell you it is a wonderful thing, after groping around in the dark for so many years to be able to switch the big searchlight on your mind and see instantly everything you want to remember.

This Roth Course will do wonders in your office. Since we took it up you never hear any one in our office say "I guess" or "I think it was about so much" or "I forget that right now" or "I can't remember" or "I must look up his name." Now they are right there with the answer—like a shot.

Have you ever heard of "Multigraph" Smith? Real name H. Q. Smith, Division Manager of the Multigraph Sales Company, Ltd., in Montreal. Here is just a bit from a letter of his that I saw last week:

"Here is the whole thing in a nutshell: Mr. Roth has a most remarkable Memory Course. It is simple, and easy as falling off a log. Yet with one hour a day of practice, anyone—I don't care who he is—can improve his Memory 100% in a week and 1,000% in six months."

My advice to you is don't wait another minute. Send to the Independent Corporation for Mr. Roth's amazing course and see what a wonderful memory you have got. Your dividends in increased earning power will be enormous.

VICTOR JONES.

Send No Money

So confident is the Independent Corporation, the publishers of the Roth Memory Course, that once you have an opportunity to see in your own home how easy it is to double, yes, triple your memory power in a few short hours, that they are willing to send the course on free examination.

Don't send any money. Merely mail the coupon or write a letter and the complete course will be sent, all charges prepaid, at once. If you are not entirely satisfied send it back any time within five days after you receive it and you will owe nothing.

On the other hand, if you are as pleased as are the thousands of other men and women who have used the course, send only $5 in full payment. You take no risk and you have everything to gain, so mail the coupon now before this remarkable offer is withdrawn. (Adver.)

the water of every ship in every yard that can be made ready. The total loss by submarines and mines to neutral and Allied shipping, exclusive of Great Britain in April was 84,393 tons. The British loss was 220,709 tons. The rate of destruction is now about 3,500,000 tons a year and decreasing, while the rate of construction in Allied and neutral shipyards has passed 4,000,000 a year, and is increasing rapidly. Admiral Sims, American commander abroad, on May 24, declared the U-Boat beaten.

EXIT BEER AND WINE. The House of Representatives, on May 23, by a vote of 178 to 137 inserted in the Food Stimulation Bill a clause permitting the President, by proclamation, to prohibit the use of foodstuffs and fruits in the making of malt and vinous liquors for beverage purposes.

BRINGING DOWN THE FLYERS. The official statement on aerial operation, issued in London, on May 21, reported that in the two months since the beginning of the German offensive a thousand German airplanes had been brought down and a thousand tons of bombs had been dropped over the enemy's lines. On May 18 twenty-seven German planes were destroyed by the British and three were driven down out of control, while the French in two days brought down thirty-eight enemy machines. The Allied control of the air was well evidenced on a day late in May, when 120 Allied bombing machines working behind perfect protection of scout machines and fighting planes, scattered destruction broadcast in the enemy held territory. Cologne was bombed, on May 17, much damage resulting; fourteen persons being killed, and forty being injured.

IRISH REVOLUTION HATCHED IN AMERICA. The British government arrested more than 500 Sinn Fein leaders in the two or three days following the taking of Edward de Valera into custody, the arrangements being carried through like clockwork, very much to the surprise of the Sinn Feiners, who were said to have boasted that the English were afraid to arrest the leaders and would only meddle with the small fry of the organization. No disturbances occurred, and Dublin was reported as quieter than usual. The proclamation issued at the time of the arrests called upon the Irish people for greater enlistments, and was taken in many quarters to indicate that the government had abandoned conscription for the island. While this was denied it was evident that the British authorities planned to make haste slowly in this direction. There were reports, persistent and undeniable, that the evidence upon which the arrests were based had come from America and that the center of the plotting had been on America's soil where Sinn Fein agents and agents of Germany were in contact. It was announced that the Sinn Feiners arrested might be interned until the end of the war, or according to the legal phrase held "during the King's pleasure" thus preventing their being brought to trial. Prof. John MacNeill was nominated by the Sinn Feiners to take the place of Prof. de Valera. MacNeill is regarded as a moderate.

HUGHES REQUESTS NO SENATE AIR INQUIRY. Former Justice Hughes, on May 18, addressed a letter to the Attorney General, in which he set out in detail his reasons for desiring that the investigation by the department of justice into the aircraft situation should not be paralleled by a similar investigation by a Senate Committee. He expressed the fear that the two investigations would be mutually destructive and stated his conviction that all necessary ends would be served by the making public of the results of the investigation which he was to conduct under the authority of the Attorney General. This letter was forwarded to Senator Chamberlain, Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, and it seemed probable, on May 22, that Senator Chamberlain's Committee would not investigate.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. German U-Boats are said to have again started unrestricted warfare on Norwegian fishing boats in the Arctic, throwing the fishing fleet into confusion—and Germany gets most of the fish. . . . Following a three-day celebration, the Bohemian National Theater of Prague was closed because of the charge that the celebration had led to expressions of a treasonable character and the city was declared under martial law. On the 22nd an official decree was issued at Vienna, providing that for the division of Bohemia into twelve government districts crossing national lines and giving an advantage to the German elements in Bohemia. The movement was said to have been taken to crush the Czechs. . . . Alex. F. Kerensky was reported, on May 23, to be about to take up his residence in New York City, Russian friends having purchased a house for him on Riverside Drive. . . . It was reported, on May 22, that Great Britain had warned Finland against making any fresh attacks against the Mourmansk railway. An attempt of Judge Svinhufvud, temporary dictator of Finland, to turn the government into a limited monarchy, was followed by meetings of protest throughout all of Finland. Editors of the Finnish newspapers, on May 22, by a large majority voted for a republic. . . . The Senate, on May 18, passed the Rivers and Harbors Appropriation bill, in spite of the fact that several senators charged that it had too much of the smell of pork about it. The bill carried appropriations of upwards of $27,000,000. . . . The Senate, on May 22, passed the Naval Appropriation bill adding about $226,000,000 to the appropriations voted by the House, bringing the total to $1,615,000,000. . . . While food conditions in Germany are reported as increasingly serious, and the bread ration was reduced on May 20, France faces the end of rationing. The Food Controller, on May 21, announced that the end of food restrictions was in sight and that crop conditions promised the best harvest since 1898. It was also announced that radical measures would be instituted to stop profiteering in food. . . . Miss Katherine Stinson, the aviator, on May 23, attempting a non-stop Chicago to New York flight, landed at Binghamton, N. Y., after breaking both the American record for a single non-stop flight and the American endurance record. She flew 783 miles in eleven hours and thirteen minutes. The world's record flight was made June 20-21, 1917, by Lieut. A. Marchal of the French Army from Nancy, France, to Chelm, Poland, 812.5 miles. . . . President Wilson, on May 24, ordered a reduction of 10 cents a ton in the price of soft coal, saving $60,000,000 to consumers generally, but adding to railway expenses by making all users pay the same rate. . . . It appeared probable, on May 25, that Congress would be held in session until it had enacted a new revenue bill to raise an additional three to four billions for the treasury. It was expected that the principal levies would be on incomes, profits, inheritances and luxuries. If a bill is enacted it will open the way for a repeal of the postal zone law.

The absence of air raids on Paris and London since March 21 was ascribed to the necessity, felt by the Germans, to make use of their whole flying strength against the Allies in the battle area. Whether or not this indicates the offensive has been abandoned, the Germans on May 20 resumed their air attacks on London, sending over the largest squadron ever launched against the British capitol. Few of the planes reached London, the barrage of the anti-aircraft batteries proving impenetrable to most of them. Four were brought down and a fifth fell flaming into the sea on its way home, while two more were reported to have fallen into the sea. The planes that succeeded in flying over the metropolitan area did considerable damage to property, killing 44 people and wounded 179, while six persons were injured in the provinces outside of the city. On the next night an attempted bombing raid in Paris was completely foiled, one German plane being brought down. Three persons were killed and some wounded in the environs of Paris. In the earlier hours of May 22, one plane of a second squadron succeeded in penetrating the Paris defenses. One person was killed and 12 were injured in the city.

The 21st, 22nd and 23rd of May were not marked by any important military events in the west. On the 22d the British reported further progress in Mesopotamia toward Mosul, reaching Fatha, north of Tekrit on the Tigris. Earlier in the week there were reports of a Turkish force advancing southward in Persia behind the right flank of the British in Mesopotamia; but some 200 miles of almost impenetrable mountains largely neutralized the danger from this source.

Although the British, French, Belgian and American artillery continued throughout the week to harass the Germans in every position and concentration point, American batteries in Picardy putting out of action eight of ten German batteries that had been firing at the American positions, and although the Allied armies raided and patrolled with increasing daring and effectiveness, the German army lay, through brilliant days and moonlit nights, sullen and silent, except for trench raids here and there, suffering losses but not striking back. On May 23 there was rumor, supported by a dispatch from an American diplomatic representative abroad, that Germany was drafting convicts to fill its battered battalions, that the munition factories were being stripped of men, that border garrisons were being reduced and troops hurried westward from Rumania. There was also a rumor that the German leaders were at odds, the political leaders being opposed to a continuation of the offensive which was to have brought victory in three weeks and has brought only anguish in two months. Prisoners are also said on May 24 to report a weakening of German morale under the smashing blows of Allied attacks from the air, everything from the line to the Rhine being fair gain, which the German airmen are powerless to prevent, although they are being "downed by dozens" every day in vain but brave attempts to win back the lost supremacy in the air.

The Germans find it possible to do considerable bombing back of the Allied lines, especially at night. On Sunday night a large squadron of German Gothas (their pilot, who was brought down, said he was following a railway), almost demolished a British Red Cross hospital, killing hundreds of wounded men and a large number of nurses. The hospital buildings were bombed twice within two hours.

British seaplanes bombed Zeebrugge on May 20 and 22, making direct hits on the mole and the German seaplanes base. The observers reported a German destroyer sunk by these raids, and also told of attempts on the part of the Germans to hack a new channel through the sea wall between the canal gates and the sunken British cruisers. The whole German torpedo flotilla is reported immobilized, penned in the harbor at Zeebrugge.

May 25 saw the field of battle again sodden under driving rain. German raiders near Buequoy penetrated the British positions on May 24, and took a few prisoners; the enemy also made raids near Lens and Hill 90. The Allies raided successfully at points all the way from Ypres to Rheims. In the meantime German troops continued to press eastward in Russia, and the White Russian Republic has been proclaimed with Germany's consent. White Russia lies east of Poland, north of the Ukraine, and adjoins and partly includes Lithuania. Dispatches of May 24 reported a German division at Dvinsk, to have mutinied when ordered to France. Fifty soldiers were said to have been shot and 2,000 imprisoned.

FLAG DAY (June 14th) INDEPENDENCE DAY and EVERY DAY

THE least thing you can do for your country is to—show its flag. Let your neighbors know that yours is a patriotic home. Stand solidly behind the great principles of Freedom and Human Rights and let the flag tell it. At this critical time in the history of your country you should pledge your allegiance by displaying the Stars and Stripes.

Here is the very flag you have wanted—a large-sized "Old Glory" six feet long by four feet wide. It will add much to your celebration of Flag Day (June 14th), Independence Day and you will need it too for other National Holidays and local celebrations when the American Flag is indispensable.

The illustration is an actual photographic reproduction of this splendid large flag. To insure durability the stripes are double-stitched. Excellent bright colors, guaranteed not to fade or shrink. Pole is not included.

OUR OFFER SEND NO MONEY NOW

We make it easy for you to secure this splendid large flag. By placing an order for thousands of these flags we were able to purchase them at a considerable reduction. We will give you the benefit of this saving, and have made the terms so liberal that all may take advantage of this offer,—half the price of a similar flag if purchased in a store and at a time when it is most needed.

Send no money now. Merely mail the order blank below and we will send the flag, all charges prepaid by us. If, after five days examination, you decide not to keep the flag, return it at our expense and you will be under no obligation. You need not purchase it unless convinced of its value. But, if you decide to keep the flag, send $1.00 within five days after its receipt and $1.00 a month for two months, a total of $3.00. This pays for the flag and also for a year's subscription to the Christian Herald. 52 issues—regular subscription price $2.00 a year.

Books Worth While

The Heart of a Soldier. By Lauchlan Maclean Watt. George H. Doran Co. $1.35.

The author is a Scottish padre whose experience of the war began in the camps in 1914 and still continues. Scenes in hospital, illuminating bits of conversation, glimpses humorous and pathetic of daily life "up the line," on "trek" and in trench, form the substance of these intimate sketches interspersed with poems. We learn of the strange mascots and the curious customs and new vocabulary of the men. Delightful bits of Scottish dialect and flavor add to these legends and stories of the front. The message of the book is both warm with human interest and deeply spiritual. In the words of the author, "This is not necessarily a parson's book, though written by a padre. I leave others to write of battles and horrors. I wish to show from inner knowledge the lives of the men and what they really are like in the circumstances of war."

Psychology and Preaching. By Charles S. Gardner, Professor of Homiletics and Sociology in The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Macmillan Co., New York, $2.

Most of this book is as applicable to secular oratory, narration, etc., as to preaching. This greatly adds to its value, as it permits the author to take a broad view of his subject. The first hundred odd pages are devoted to a well written and compact consideration of the general principles of modern psychology applicable to the broad subject. This portion of the book is as interesting to the general reader as to the professional, and is to be highly commended on account of its fairness of presentation and clearness of statement, as well as its freedom from dogmatic assertion. A particularly interesting and well-thought-out chapter on "Belief" is followed by two, carefully considered, on "Attention" and "Suggestion," and a very good one on "Assemblies." Then comes what is perhaps the best chapter in the book, "Mental Epidemics." The last chapter, "The Modern Mind," is evidently the one on which the author has bestowed the most labor and care, and it is also that in which he has set forth his own personal views most largely. The book is free from that monotony into which it is so easy to fall in discussing subjects of this character. There is hardly a minister who would not benefit by a careful perusal of this volume, which also can be recommended to the more general reader.

Chants of War. By W. S. Pakenham-Walsh, Trinity College, Fochow. Elliot Stock, Paternoster Row, London, E.C. 40 cents.

This is a small volume of some forty-three poems on various subjects arising from the war. The best of these are perhaps "The Road to Calais," "Mons" and "Britannia." A couple of verses of the first will give a good idea of the poetic powers of our author.

To the right were the French and the mountains, to the left were the dunes and the sea,
And the line must be guarded between them, whatever the outcome might be,
But our line was as thin as a wafer, and the gateway was twenty miles wide,
And except for the men that were with us, there wasn't a rifle beside.

Impossible! That was our feeling; impossible, yet we will try,
And as French came along in his motor, he knew we would hold them or die;
"I want the impossible done, boys, and England has done it before,
And England will do it again, boys, before this October is o'er."

The Art of Saving. By Harvey A. Blodgett. The Blodgett Co., St. Paul. 50 cents.

Mr. Blodgett thinks that saving is a habit, which may be true, but if so, like all good habits, it is to many a difficult one to acquire. The chapters on investment of savings and on banking will no doubt be very valuable to that large class of persons who are almost completely ignorant of business. The booklet ends with a timely discussion of the advantageous opportunity for the investment of savings which government bonds now offer, and will continue to offer for some time to come, and gives a timely warning against "promoters" who offer investments in exchange for Liberty Bonds, the very offer proving which the promoter thinks the better security."

The Theory and Practice of Mysticism. By Charles Morris Addison, D. D., New York; E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

Max Müller in his Science of Religion writes: "There is in man a faculty which I call simply the faculty of apprehending the Infinite, not only in religion but in all things—a power independent of sense and reason, a power in a certain sense contradicted by sense and reason, yet I suppose a very real power, if we see how it has held its own from the beginning of the world, how neither sense nor reason have been able to overcome it, while it alone is able to overcome both sense and reason." This faculty in religion is called mysticism, and its best-known possessors have been St. Augustine, St. Francis of Assisi, and Henry Suso.

Of late years much interest has been taken in this subject and a very considerable number of works have been devoted to it, particularly in England. The book before us, by Rev. Charles M. Addison, gives an excellent historical sketch of mysticism in the early and medieval church, while the last two chapters, "Modern Mysticism" and "Practical Mysticism," discuss the subject in our day in clear and simple language. A full bibliography of the subject adds greatly to the reference value of the work.

The Call of the Bells. By Edmund Mitchell. Menzies Publishing Co. $1.

A well-written and absorbing story. Donald Brodie, a drunken hobo, finds himself on the roadside in Arizona. A tramp companion proposes to him a robbery. He refuses to steal and abandons his comrade by "jumping a freight." A day or two later Donald reaches Riverside, California, penniless, hungry and mad for drink. Opportunity throws a chance to steal a purse in his way; he yields to the temptation and immediately leaves the place. Chance, or, better, Providence, a day later brings him to take an involuntary bath and to hear a sermon by a celebrated London divine at the university in Claremont. The sermon sends him back to Riverside to restore the stolen money to its owner. The latter, however, prosecutes him, but the judge before whom he comes is so impressed by his story and the restitution of the stolen property, and is so good a reader of character, that he places Donald on probation for a year. This year Donald passes with a Rev. John Dana, and at its end the man who yielded to temptation is a man again.

Brodie then goes home to his mother in St. Louis, and besides working in a terra cotta and tile factory, does what he can to help up his fallen fellow men. He meets one day in a back alley of the town a Jimmy Sheldon, the profligate son of the head of the Sheldon Manufacturing Company of San Francisco, drunk and penniless. How Donald saves Jimmy and by skilful management makes him appreciate the real meaning of life, is both dramatically and naturally told. Finally Jimmy goes home and Donald goes with him. Donald enters Mr. Sheldon's employ and eventually defeats an attempt by a banker named Wilmington to get possession of the Sheldon Company. Jimmy has a sister, whose courtship by Donald supplies the love element.

The book is much above the average and well sustains the reader's interest as the plot unfolds. Besides the human side of the book, many social questions, such as the relations of capital and labor, the uplifting of the weak by the strong, the nobility of toil, are treated of in the optimistic spirit of brotherhood. Perhaps the first half of the book is the best, because the action is more simple and strong; but the story as a whole is well worth a reading.

This is a really interesting and very sympathetic biography of the comparatively little-known life of Mary Slessor, a Scottish missionary. Although primarily written for young people, it could be read with advantage by those of more mature age.

Mary Slessor, the subject of the book, was born in Aberdeen of poor parents. Her early years were darkened by her father's failings, which forced her to begin to earn her own living in the mill when very young. In 1876 Miss Slessor, after preliminary teaching in the Dundee missions, was sent to Calabar, in what was then one of the wildest parts of Africa, by the Mission Board of the United Presbyterian Church in Edinburgh. From the day she landed in Calabar till the day she died near there, just after the outbreak of the Great War, her life was a ceaseless exhibition of heroism, devotion, faith and work.

Her dearest friend describes her as "a whirlwind and an earthquake and a fire and a still small voice, all in one." Her influences over the natives in the districts in which she labored became supreme, to such an extent indeed that the British government made her consul, the first woman in the empire to hold this position, and, later on, judge; both of which offices she filled in a highly satisfactory manner.

A good book for any ambitious girl, since it teaches trenchantly the power of will and work combined.

Questions and Answers

E. J. W. Mott, N. D. When saying in the Lord's Prayer, "Thy will be done," if we then pray for other things that we desire, is that praying that God's will be done?

We are told by Christ to ask and we shall receive, and in everything, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, to let our requests be made known to God. There are two kinds of gifts that we can ask for, the spiritual and the temporal. The spiritual we are to ask for without any exception or condition, because they are absolutely and unconditionally necessary for our righteousness and salvation; while the temporal gifts, because not absolutely necessary for our salvation, should be asked for conditionally. This condition is that God would be pleased to grant these gifts if they tend to the praise of his divine glory and to the promotion of our salvation—not otherwise. We must remember that God can do all we ask for and will do so, if it is good for us; but when in his wisdom and omniscience he sees that what we ask is not good for us, then he would not be a good Father if he gave it to us. We must also remember that he wants all his children to be happy and contented and wherever he can, consistently with our welfare, give us gifts that we ask for, he gives them to us. We are to come to him freely and trustingly, knowing that he will give us all we ask for, provided it is good for us to have it.

A. J. L., Chatterton, Va. Little is known of the life of Judas before his appearance among the disciples, and everything said about his family connection is mere conjecture. He was probably drawn by the Baptist's preaching, or by his own ambitions relative to the Messianic kingdom, in which he might play an important and lucrative part. Having been intimate with the finance of the little company of apostles, he probably enjoyed a measure of confidence, undeserved though it was.

S. S., St. Vincent, Calif. 1. In baptism we put on Christ. All our sins, both inherited and actual, are covered by his righteousness and washed away with his blood. The apostle says (Gal. 3 : 26, 27): "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ," and in Acts 2 : 38 we read, "Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins," etc. 2. God is no Moloch, neither is he unreasonable; hence it is impossible to conceive of a loving Father condemning a child which has not reached the age of responsibility. Christ's righteousness is imputed to all, and Christ loved children and said of them: "of such is the Kingdom." 3. The account in Luke and Matthew do not really differ materially. Each mentions both thieves, although the fact that only one reviled the Lord may have been overlooked by Matthew.

C. G., Montgomery, Mich. Please explain Matt. 27 : 52, 53; Luke 24 : 36, 37.

1. It will be helpful to remember that the Jewish tombs, unlike ours, were either natural or artificial excavations in rocks, or in the side of hills, the entrance being closed by a door or a large stone. These stone doors or rocks were moved or totally removed by the earthquake. Thus there was testimony that Christ's death had burst the bands of the grave. Though aroused, the actual rising as individuals (verse 53) did not take place till after Christ's resurrection. This extraordinary event was symbolic and supernatural. It proclaimed the victory over death. It is doubtful who the saints were that were thus raised; they may have been saints of earlier times, but probably were saints known in their lifetime to the apostles. 2. In Luke 24 : 36, 37 we have an account of one of our Lord's appearances to his disciples after the resurrection. We must not assume that Luke intends us to regard the whole chapter as the history of one day. Some authorities hold that there had been an interval between the events related in verses 36 and 50.

C. C. B., Berwick, Pa. In Luke 6 : 13 and Mark 3 : 14 we have an account of the choosing of the twelve whom Christ ordained as apostles. They were first to be trained for their work, the best preparation for which was their being with their Lord, learning of him and about him at first hand. It was in keeping with such training that the name "apostle" should be given to keep the future duty before them. The actual "sending forth" did not take place till after the resurrection. (See Luke 24 : 49; Mark 16 : 15; Matt. 28 : 19.) The passage in Matt. 28 : 19 shows that, before the resurrection, they were not ready to be sent, for they did not have as yet the chief argument for belief in their Master, namely his conquering death. The Gospel without a risen Lord is of no avail. Until the apostles had proof of this fact, their preaching would have been largely in vain.

Reader. You must not allow morbid thoughts to disturb you. Your children were given you by God for a definite purpose. Fulfill it by making of them clean-living, God-fearing boys and girls, and you will have done more for the world and for God's Kingdom than have those who never had children, and, what is worse, those who never wanted any. We must not quarrel with our lot, blaming it on fate or destiny. Remember that God, who rules all, is not only all-love, but also all-wise and all-knowing. As to what will become of your children, their heavenly Father will take care of them. Trust in God for all. He is the "Wonderful Helper" in time of trouble.

Miss G. H. O., Worcester, Mass. While we have no direct statement that Christ affirmed the Mosaic authorship or inspiration of the first five books—the miraculous narratives of the Old Testament—there is collateral evidence as to all of this right in Jesus' own words. He refers to Moses and the Prophets in his talks and arguments, as do the apostles. He refers to the history of Jonah (Matt. 12 : 39); the lifting up of the serpent by Moses in the wilderness (John 3 : 14); He quotes from the Psalms (Luke 20 : 42) and certifies that they and the Prophets wrote of him (Luke 24 : 44); and he taught from them in the synagogues (Matt. 12). Would he have done all this with writings and sayings that were man-made or unauthentic? There is no doubt about it, that one of the strong arguments for the authenticity and inspiration of the Old Testament writings is the fact that Jesus uses them as his texts, and not only refers to them, but by such use indorses them. What he did for the Old Testament we are justified in doing for the New. It speaks of him, and it is his Word (Matt. 24 : 35); why should we not believe it and accept it?

A Friend, Pa. The passage you ask about is in 1 Tim. 5 : 24. The apostle had been giving instructions to various members of the congregation as to church government and pastoral relations. He then says of some men that their sins are so flagrant, notorious and evident that no trial is needed to convict, while others are so well hidden and in hand that only on occasion do they at last overtake the sinner and show him in his true colors. The warning of the apostle is twofold: the one against too hasty acceptance or acquittal as to a man's fitness, the other against too hasty condemnation. The disciple is taught that if he inquires carefully and has the gift of insight, he will find out before long what men are and what they are doing.

M. C., Butler, Mo. 1. Beginning with the Parable of the Wise and the Foolish Builders in Matt. 7 : 24-27, and ending with the parable of the vine and its branches in John 15 : 1, Christ's parables, taken as complete expositions, number forty-seven. He spoke in parables freely in order to make his sayings attractive to the uneducated hearers with whom he was often dealing, and to drive home his point by the force of homely examples. Many great men have had this method of argument and narrative and have used it effectively. 2. No temple ever built is believed to have come up to the grandeur and beauty of Solomon's temple. The one restored by Zerubbabel was larger but not greater.

A few drops of Freezone loosen corns so they peel off

Apply a few drops of Freezone upon a tender, aching corn or a callus. The soreness stops and shortly the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off without a twinge of pain.

Freezone removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Freezone does not irritate the surrounding skin. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.

A small bottle of Freezone costs but a few cents at drug stores anywhere.

Twenty-Four Great War Posters to Every Reader of the Christian Herald

TWENTY-FOUR of the greatest war posters have been made into a booklet by the American government.

They are the work of some of the best American and foreign artists.

They vividly portray every impulse and emotion of war—its pity and horror, its rush and thunder, its purposes and hopes, its call to service both at home and on the fighting line.

They are the very spirit of the war in pictures!

Any American citizen can obtain free a copy of this graphic war book—a priceless souvenir of a great epoch in American history.

Write at once. Get your letter in the first mail so you will be sure to get your copy before the supply gives out.

Send your name and address with a two-cent stamp to cover postage to The Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C., and a copy of the War Poster Book will be sent you free of charge.

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

A Co-ordinated, Constructive Teaching, Being the Addresses Delivered at the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference, May 28-30, 1918

THE widely published Call for a Conference of the most eminent Bible Teachers and Authorities on Prophetic Interpretation in the United States and Canada, issued several weeks ago, has met with a response which gives assurance that the Conference will be the most notable and authoritative gathering of its kind ever held in this country.

It will assemble in the Academy of Music, Broad and Locust Streets, Philadelphia, and will be in session from May 28 to 30, inclusive. It will be a gathering of the finest consecrated scholarship of all the Christian denominations, and its deliberations and addresses on "The Return of Our Lord and Related Events" will possess a vital spiritual interest for Christian men and women throughout the world.

Perhaps the best evidence of the widespread interest in the work of the Conference is shown in the fact that the Executive Committee has already received upwards of 35,000 inquiries by mail, while the Christian Herald, which published the Conference Call, has also received a very large number. In view of this extraordinary manifestation of interest, an arrangement has been made under which the Christian Herald will publish the proceedings and the addresses of the Conference in a volume to be issued as soon as possible after adjournment, entitled "LIGHT ON PROPHECY."

The forthcoming book, "LIGHT ON PROPHECY" will be prepared under the special supervision of the Committee of the Conference, and will receive the official authorization of the body. It will be the only volume to receive such authorization. We are confident that the addresses will be welcomed by Bible lovers everywhere, and especially by the constantly growing number of those who believe that we are living in a time of prophetic fulfillment. The book will contain all the addresses, about 20 in number, and will be about 300 pages.

There are very many who are striving to attain a clearer comprehension of the prophecies and who have said to themselves: "I wish I could sit at the feet of some really great Christian scholar—some man of enlightened understanding—and could study prophecy face to face with him." This book, "LIGHT ON PROPHECY," by presenting the spirit of the Conference and the utterances of the speakers, will give to all an opportunity to realize their desire. They will find in its pages a series of addresses which will bear reading and re-reading, and quiet studying, until the full message of the Conference is comprehended.

SPEAKERS AND TOPICS AT THE CONFERENCE

Among the leading speakers at the Conference will be many whose names are familiar in the world of religious thought, and especially to those who are interested in Prophecy.

Dr. Harris H. Gregg, of Winnipeg, Canada, an eminent Canadian divine, will speak on "The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible."

At a later session he will also speak on "What Is to Become of the Church."

Dr. William B. Riley, of the First Church of Minneapolis, Minn., will speak on "The Greatest Question Jesus Ever Asked," and he will also deliver what is the "crowning address" of the Conference on "What Manner of Christians Ought We to Be?"

Dr. C. I. Scofield, editor of the Scofield Reference Bible, will speak on "Where is Christ Now and What is He Doing?" At a later session Dr. Scofield will also speak on "The Coming Glory."

Dr. Mark Matthews, ex-Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, will speak on "The Doctrine of Our Lord's Return," and later the same eminent divine will speak on "Has God a Program?" giving the order of events and showing why the present world conditions are not indicative of Armageddon.

Dean W. L. Pettingill, of the Philadelphia School of the Bible, will speak on "Did the Cross of Christ Fulfill All the Promises of God?" covering the Atonement, the humiliation, and the status of the Church as a spiritual kingdom.

Dr. James M. Gray, of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, will speak on "God's Purpose in This Dispensation," and at a later session will give an address on "The Regathering of Israel in Unbelief," showing the relation of the Zionist Movement to the Return.

Rev. Herbert Mackenzie, of Cleveland, will discuss the question "Does the Truth of the Lord's Return Paralyze or Energize?"

Rev. P. W. Philpot, of Hamilton, Canada, will speak on "Coming Events Cast Their Shadows Before" and later on "Will There be Any Tears in Heaven, and Why?"

Rev. Cortland Myers, of Tremont Baptist Temple, Boston, will speak on "The War on German Theology."

Dr. A. E. Thompson, pastor of the American Church in Jerusalem, will speak on "The Capture of Jerusalem," showing the Holy City's place in fulfilled prophecy.

There will be other speakers, but those mentioned above will give an idea of the wide range of the Conference and of the quality of scholarship engaged in it.

Cooperation With the Sunday School
Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topics. I Cor. 3:4-9

BOTH the Christian Endeavor and the Sunday school are links that bind childhood to adult Christian service. In the Sunday school the child learns the fundamental truths and principles of Christian teaching. In the Young People's Society these truths and principles are put to work under actual conditions of daily life. Unless the child has been well grounded in the truths of Christ he will be handicapped in the activities of the Young People's Society. Each organization, therefore, owes to the other the utmost support and cooperation.

The regular announcement of all the activities of the Young People's Society should be a definite part of each Sunday school program. If there is a Junior Young People's Society, those pupils who have reached intermediate grade should, if possible, be graduated from the Junior into both the Intermediate grade of the Sunday school and the Junior Endeavor or B. Y. P. U. If there is no Junior Society the graduates from the intermediate to the Senior department should, if possible, be invested with a firm sense of the opportunity presented to them in membership in the Young People's Society.

This attitude of mind can only be created, however, if the Young People's Society is thoroughly awake and its members are much in evidence in the Sunday school itself. For this reason the officers of the Young People's Society should make every effort to give to the Sunday school every bit of help possible. The organization of a teachers' training class may well be made the special care of the officers of the Young People's Society. They should stand ready at all times to supply from their membership teachers, officers and members of committees for the Sunday school. If the Sunday school is organized as a missionary society, the missionary committee of the Young People's Society should cooperate with the missionary officers of the Sunday school in the search for interesting material and ways and means for the making of the missionary enterprise of the church known to the children, who will be the missionary givers and the missionaries of the next generation. If there is a Sunday school picnic, the Young People's Society may well take charge of the sports, and see to it that something to eat is provided for every child. The more intimately the Young People's Society can relate itself to the Sunday school, the more certain it will be to attract to itself the young people who are reaching young manhood and womanhood in the Sunday school. Young People's Societies constantly lose members through the demands of other departments of the church and the encroachment of the cares of maturity. There must be a constant new supply of members. The Sunday school is the best and sometimes the sole source of these. In assuring itself of the maximum of growth from the Sunday school, the Young People's Society is also insuring the maximum of life for itself.

Jealousy the Handicap of Team Work
Epworth League Topic. I Cor. 13:4;
Gal. 5:26; I Sam. 18:6-9

THE first essential of team work is willingness to be subordinate to the rest of the team, or to the leader. The person who won't work unless he can command, is not fit to command, and soon proves it if given the opportunity. Jealousy is futile in itself and a barrier to everything that is worth while. The person who gives way to jealousy not only fails to achieve, but loses everything of value which might have been won by a spirit of resignation and the willingness to be last until called upon to be first.

Rare indeed is the church which has not been disturbed by some one's jealousy. Mrs. J. won't serve on the reception committee because Mrs. B. is chairman. "That woman," she calls her. The reception goes on and succeeds without Mrs. J. But to those who know, her jealousy and refusal to take part cast a shadow on an otherwise perfect evening. Jealousy, because it so seldom effects a change in the plans of others, leads to the sulks, and the next step from sulking is unkind criticism, and unkindness cannot go far without associating with itself untruth. It is a short course, and quickly run, from jealousy to complete loss of spiritual power, and that loss of the consciousness of God's love which hangs like a leaden weight upon the conscience of the backslider. Often the jealous person has real ability which the church is denied through his jealousy. The committees on which he might have served are handicapped through the lack of his talent. There is a real crippling of the power of the society through his defection. Sometimes he takes a sort of pleasure in the knowledge that he has thus crippled things, but like every pleasure of sin, it turns to ashes and the sweetness becomes gall. There can be only two ends to jealousy—the loss of one's hope in Christ, or a new repentance and a banishing of jealousy forever from the heart.

Aid for the Children of Palestine

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: We enclose the $100 of which we wrote a few days ago for the homeless children of Palestine. May God richly bless all through whose hands it may go, and especially those into whose lives we trust it to go.

THE PROOF

We found them-and at last we knew
That fairy tales were really true!
A tiny hat, a little coat;
A shirt and trousers, mighty small,
That you could scarcely see at all;
A buckled shoe.

We found them -
At the swimming-hole.
It was a summer day, and still;
And we were whistling, until
We saw them there.
The very air

Grew charged with magic, for we knew that they Were in the water not so far away!

Well, for a minute I just stared, for oh,
I didn't dream that fairy folk could go
Out swimming far away from all their band!
I thought that fairies seldom left the land.
I couldn't, somehow, seem to understand
That they were near!
I listened hard-and I could almost hear
A little gasping breaths.
We stood there thinking they'd come get their clothes.
[Which shows how little any mortal knows

Of fairy ways.]
They would have stayed for days,
And caught their death
Of cold, before they'd think
Of taking favors from a mortal hand!

We found them, and at last we knew
That fairy tales were really true.
A tiny hat, a little coat -
Just elfland clothes so very small
There wasn't much to them at all -
A buckled shoe!

Borden's Evaporated Milk

Old-fashioned Strawberry Shortcake Made a New Way

Here's a brand new way to make old-fashioned strawberry shortcake—with Borden's Evaporated Milk. It's a favorite recipe of Mrs. Ida C. Bailey Allen, the noted specialist in home economics.

Mrs. Allen says: "I use Borden's Evaporated Milk in my strawberry shortcakes because I am sure of its purity, its economy and its flavor. There can be no question of the purity of Borden's Milk. It is safeguarded in every possible way from the time it leaves the dairy till it reaches your pantry shelves. Its economy is apparent when you whip it—you don't need expensive, heavy cream. Its flavor is assured by the quality of the raw milk used—from the finest herds, well-kept, well-fed, well taken care of. Try my recipe for strawberry shortcake. You'll find it delicious—a rare luxury at moderate cost."

Ida C. Bailey Allen

STRAWBERRY SHORTCAKE

$\frac{2}{3}$ cupful cornstarch	1 teaspoon baking powder
$\frac{1}{3}$ cupfuls barley flour	$\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt
1 rounding tablespoon butter
1 rounding tablespoon granulated sugar
$\frac{1}{2}$ cup Borden's Evaporated Milk, undiluted

Sift all dry ingredients together, work in butter, as you would for pie crust, add cream, beat with spoon (it will be very stiff), bake 20 minutes in an oblong pan. Split the cake with a hot knife, butter if desired, add 1 qt. of strawberries, which have been cut into small pieces, sweetened and allowed to stand before placing on cake. Serves 4 people.

HOW TO WHIP BORDEN'S EVAPORATED MILK

Open a can of Borden's Evaporated Milk and set the can in a saucepan full of cold water, allowing the water to cover two-thirds of the can. Bring to boiling point, but do not boil, and when the water begins to bubble, remove the can at once from the water and chill until it is ice cold. Then pour it into a deep bowl and whip with an ordinary egg-beater until it is stiff. Sweeten to taste with Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk or sugar, and add desired flavor.

A small can of Borden's Evaporated Milk whips up to make more than two cupfuls.

Mrs. Allen's Recipe Contest

For the best recipe from each state and from Canada, calling for the use of Borden's Evaporated Milk, submitted before August 1st, 1918, the Borden Company will award a cash prize of $25.00. For the second and third best recipes, prizes of $10.00 for each will be given. For every recipe accepted for publication $1.00 will be paid. In the event of ties for the first, second and third best recipes, the full amount of the prize will be given to each tying contestant.

Remember, there will be a set of three prizes for every state in the Union and a set for Canada. The prizes will be awarded by a committee of competent judges to be announced later. Each recipe will be judged on three points: 1. economy; 2. excellence of the finished dish; 3. form in which the recipe is submitted. Names of prize-winners will be published as soon as it is possible to do so after the prizes have been awarded. Address, Borden's Condensed Milk Company, 108 Hudson Street, New York.

MISS JULIA KING, Colonel's Island, Ga., sends a note showing how beekeepers can help to win the war. She writes: "The Christian Herald goes into a great many homes where bees are kept. Many beekeepers would be glad to give wax to help with the making of lambrine, to heal the wounds of our soldiers without a scar, did they know how much the wax would help. I have over 50 colonies now, working with might and main, working as hard as they can, making honey to help out with the Food Supply and the shortage of sugar, and also making wax to give to the Red Cross for the making of lambrine. We always enjoy the Christian Herald. I appreciate your kindness and interest when you helped me last year to find out where to send my wax for the making of lambrine." Miss King explains that lambrine, discovered by Dr. Barthe de Santfort several years ago, is being used in military hospitals with such marvelous effect that patients, although horribly burned, show no scars, and the treatment is absolutely painless.

Missionary William C. Terril of Inhambane, East Africa, writes to the Christian Herald: "I thank you very heartily for myself and in the name of this mission for sending me the recent gift of $180 for the work here, the same being from Mr. C. N. Tinker of Mosquero, New Mexico. I am writing to Mr. Tinker by this same mail and reporting to him in detail about this work and especially his protégés here. We are especially encouraged over the result of the treatment of our two Christian lepers, Martha and Elisa. They were discharged from the leper camp on Christmas Day as cured. Some of the medical profession would take exception to this statement. We, however, wish to say that for the past two years all open sores have disappeared and all other signs of this dreaded disease, except the fingers and toes which they lost some years ago. This mission heard of the successful use of calamugra oil in the Philippines and India, and decided to experiment with it on Martha and Elisa. At a very great cost these two have undergone a three years' treatment, and, as far as all of us are concerned, it is a remarkable success. Now they send thanks and deep gratitude to the friends in America who gave in order that they could remain at the mission and have these treatments."

[The Editor of the Medical Record, 51 Fifth Avenue, New York, to whom the two foregoing letters have been referred, writes: "Apparent cures have been obtained by chaulmoogra oil (not calamugra, as spelled by your correspondent). You can obtain more information regarding this from Dr. Victor G. Heiser, International Health Board, 61 Broadway, New York City. Ambrine is a secret French preparation used in the treatment of burns. There are, however, other preparations of the same order equally efficacious, which are employed by the British and American surgeons on the other side, and also by surgeons in this country. I do not know whether beeswax is employed in the preparation of ambrine, but it is not in many of the substitutes, which apparently are equally efficacious."]

M. B., Forest City, Iowa. The Father remembers his promises. Prayer should be a reminder to ourselves not only of his promises to us but of our obligations to him. Cease striving to have him adjust himself to your ways, and strive to adjust yourself to his ways; then your prayers will no longer fail. Prayer is the preparing of ourselves for his blessings. It is the cleansing of the cup in readiness for his wine, which awaits only the cleansing. Prayer is not simply the telling of our needs; it is the consecration of ourselves to what he wants. We are assured that what we ask with faith we shall receive. Complete surrender of the soul to God's will is the perfect prayer.

B. L., St. Hilaire, Minn. We strongly advise against the lottery plan in securing money, especially for spiritual work. The gift itself is far less important than the spirit of the giving. It is not our money gotten by hook or crook, that God asks, but self-sacrifice freely offered. There is a strong feeling against accepting for benevolence money made by any doubtful methods, and we should be on guard against any suggestion of doubt in our method of giving. The old excuse that a good cause justifies the means is no longer in favor.

Bread an' jam in war times!
Once it was 'at we
Had jam upon our wheaten loaf
Fer tea.
But now 'at dad is fightin',
An' since th' crops is dead,
There's times an' times we haven't had Even bread!

Bread an' jam in war times
Makes us think o' when Dad'll come a-marchin' home.
Maybe then
We'll have other, bigger crops,
An' there'll be,
Lots o' bread an' jam ter eat
Fer tea!

Let Your Prayer Be Backed by Work That Wins

Here is a New Free Book That Tells You How to Protect Your Garden from Diseases and Insect Pests.

WHAT does your garden mean to YOU? Does it mean hard work, dirty hands and feet and a sweaty brow? Or—Does it mean the joy of watching things grow, the sweet smell of earth and fields afar. The cooling showers,—the mellowing sunbeams and the myriad sounds of Mother Earth.

Your Planting has been done—What are you doing NOW? Watching with careless eyes what nature shall do for you? Or—are you speeding up the processes of nature, to the end that you shall be the gainer?

Your Care of Your Garden—Yes, it is YOUR care—Place your seeds on a shelf and be they ever so fine, they will remain nothing but small hard seeds to the end of time. YOUR CARE is what counts—the earth you place them in—the sun—the rain—AND—YOUR CARE.

Then What—More care—and that you may do so most intelligently we shall send you this book—FREE for the asking.

Contents of This Book—Seventy-two pages. One hundred and eighty-one pictures. The largest of nearly a thousand Bulletins issued by the Department of Agriculture. Written in simple language for quick action. You Need This Book and need it quickly. Send your name and address plainly written to the CHRISTIAN HERALD INFORMATION BUREAU, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C., enclosing a two-cent stamp, for return postage and you will receive, entirely free, a copy of The Garden Insect Book.

L. G., Payette, Idaho. Please explain Matt. 24 : 14, 15.

As the preaching of the Gospel throughout the Roman world preceded the end of the Jewish state, so the preaching of the Gospel throughout the whole world of today may be interpreted as intimating the approaching end of this age. Whether more will accept than will reject the Gospel is not stated, but the fact remains that the universal sending out of preachers no less than the widespread apostasy is accepted as such a sign by many eminent Bible students.

Subscriber. In I Tim. 6 : 16, the apostle declares that only God hath immortality, meaning that in God alone is immortality, the very essence of his being.

Mrs. M. E. McO., Orlando, Fla. 1. The writer in Luke 21 : 25-33 is telling of signs that will precede the coming of Christ for our final redemption. It is true that he redeemed us by his death, and that nothing else save our acceptance of him as Saviour is required to make his work complete. While here on earth, however, we must be content to accept the conditions of our surroundings bravely and in good spirit, remembering that the Son of God became "in all things as we are," subject to hardship, temptation and persecution, "yet without sin." With his help we can overcome all these. 2. The generation spoken of in the passage referred to is the generation of the Jews to which Christ prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem.

Reader. In I Cor. 14 : 18, 21, the apostle is praising spiritual gifts, and among those he classes the ability to speak in a tongue understandable by his hearers. He wants his audience to join in the responses and carries out the idea that one who does not understand cannot intelligently do this. Therefore, though he, Paul, spoke many tongues, he praised God for the ability to speak so as to be understood. The men of "strange tongues," mentioned in verse 21, are the Assyrians, who were sent as a judgment to the Jews.

M. O. H., Groville, N. Y. In John 21 : 15, our Lord by his repeated question, "Peter, lovest thou me more than these?" is exposing to Peter's view the remembrance of the pride and self-sufficiency by which his fall had been hastened, and he wants him once more to assure him that he really does love the Master as he would be loved, not with the hasty assertion, "Though all men shall be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended"; but with the genuine warmth and sincerity that come through conviction.

S. E. K., Malvern, Pa. In Luke 22 : 36, the references to purse, wallet and sword had each a spiritual significance; but the whole is a figurative setting forth of the fact that henceforth self-defense would be their chief necessity, in view of the outward perils which would come upon them.

Layman, Wilmington, S. C., writes: "What is the most vital thing that could happen to this country in the next three months? Is it not practical religion in the home, the establishment of the family altar, reading the Word of God, and prayer morning and evening? Is not this the bed-rock of vital godliness?"

Reader, Chillicothe, Ohio. For an enumeration of the spiritual gifts see Acts 11 : 17, I Cor. 12 : 13, I Pet. 4 : 10. The gift of healing is held by some denominations as having belonged exclusively to apostolic times, while others claim that it is granted even now to those who have sufficient faith. In other words, that God's hand is not shortened that he cannot save: that in answer to the prayer of faith he still pardons our iniquities and heals our diseases (Ps. 103 : 3), and that there are well-authenticated instances, that cannot be questioned, of prayers answered for the restoration of health. You will find these matters fully discussed in the book, "The Miracle of Answered Prayer."

W. P. S., Lindsay, Calif. Paul's injunction for his hearers to be in subjection to the higher powers is in line with the general order divinely instituted throughout nature. The whole planetary system moves in obedience to law, and on our own world the recurring seasons and the productivity of the earth all move in accord with fixed principles. Paul's reference was, therefore, to powers and laws that are salutary and beneficent. These and their administrators were to be respected and obeyed. Any laws or lawmakers violating these essential principles would not fall under the law of loyalty and would be out of place and unworthy of being obeyed.

J. J. B., Bridger, S. D. A great deal has been written about the Temptation. In reading the 4th chapter of Matthew, which records it, we should take into consideration the incident at the conclusion of chapter 3. "The tempter's object," says one leading commentator, "was to get Jesus to distrust the heavenly testimony borne to him at his baptism, and to get him to regard it as but a splendid illusion," and to accomplish this he tempted him with the vision of world power. There is no statement as to the visible form assumed by the tempter. He may have come subtly into the heart and consciousness of the Messiah, without substance or visibility, using all his art and cunning to persuade him to accept the powers and crowns and kingdoms that Satan did not own, but had usurped.

A Great Prophetic Conference

Eminent Religious Leaders, Ministers and Laymen at a Three Days' Gathering in Philadelphia

By PHILIP I. ROBERTS

"THIS," said Dean William L. Pettingill of the Philadelphia School of the Bible, when he rose to address the great Conference which convened May 28, in the Academy of Music, "is most assuredly the very biggest Bible class I ever saw in my life."

One could not well be surprised at the remark, for the speaker stood facing a huge auditorium, thronged from floor to roof, by an audience of earnest, Christian folk, whose unquenched and unquenchable faith was enabling them to look beyond the purple mists that fill the valley of the present, to the hilltops of the future. In this gathering were men and women from twenty-three states, and also from China, from Africa, from Central America.

The men who were at the head of the Conference and recognized as leaders, included the Rev. William B. Riley, Minneapolis; Rev. Dr. James H. Gray, Chicago; Rev. Dr. Cortland R. Myers, Boston; Rev. P. W. Philpot, Hamilton, Ontario; Rev. Dr. Mark Matthews, Seattle; Rev. Dr. Harris H. Gregg, Winnipeg, Canada; Charles M. Alexander; Rev. Herbert Mackenzie, Cleveland; Rev. A. E. Thompson, former pastor of the American Church at Jerusalem; Rev. William L. Pettingill, Wilmington; Rev. John McInnis, of Syracuse, N. Y.; and others.

Although the main topic of the Conference was announced as "The Return of Our Lord," and while the speeches were based on Bible prophecy, it was not difficult to discover that neither hectic excitement nor mob-magnetism had drawn these people to Philadelphia. Here, apparently, was a host of sane, sober, self-contained Christians, who, holding to the Scriptural teaching as it has been taught and accepted by the Church since apostolic times, believe that they are now living in days of prophetic fulfillment.

NO intelligent observer can fail to discern that an immensely quickened interest in prophecy is a sign of the times. One hears of it almost everywhere. Yet it is a notable fact that extremists, alarmists and "fixed-date" men were conspicuous by their absence from the Conference, or if present, they contrived to remain modestly in the background. The assembly was of quite another order. "We do not know," said a balanced and able student of prophecy to me, on the opening day, "we only believe. Very many things we learn only by meeting them face to face, as we tread the inevitable journey that awaits us all."

Now, that is a fair and a courageous statement—one which I am quite sure reflected the tone and spirit of this notable Conference. Without definite knowledge, yet possessed by unswerving faith; without alarm or excitement but imbued by a spirit of staid, sober inquiry, those who composed it came together to ask of themselves, and each other—"What are to be the fortunes of the Kingdom of God in this world? Is it to conquer and fill the whole earth or not? How long is the present order to continue?"

One of the sanest things said during Tuesday's sessions of the Conference was uttered by Henry B. Macfarland, late Chairman of the Board of Commissioners for the City of Washington, who presided at the evening meeting. "Recent happenings," he said, "have knocked the bottom out of the old conceit that man could run the world in utter independence of God. So futile has this theory been shown to be, that even those who belong to no church, who name not the Name of our common Lord, are feeling out vaguely after God, if haply they may find Him, as after One who can reconstruct society, bring good out of evil, and light out of brooding darkness. And this is an endorsement of the view the believer consciously holds, who hopes for the fulfilment of the prophecies."

TO any judicious observer, looking at the great assemblage at the opening session of the Conference, it was very evident that the audience as a whole was composed of the quiet, serious, sober-minded type of Christian, a type very unlikely to be led away by sensational doctrine. They belong to the class of believers who are not liable to be misled by visionaries and fanatics. And indeed nothing was further from the purpose of the Conference than to stir up sharp controversies or kindle fanatical fires.

The whole subject of the Lord's Coming has, to a large extent, been discredited by speculative theories and prophetic forecasts, which the Conference leaders believe have not only no warrant whatever, but are condemned in the Scriptures.

Nevertheless, there are numberless believing Christians who look forward in hope and confidence to the coming of the King, but at a day and hour which "no man knoweth, not even the angels." They hold that Christ, and Christ only, is the ideal that will work out the reconstruction of humanity, and that only in accordance with the law of His Kingdom can humanity ever enter a heritage of unity and concord.

Whoever had charge of the formation and arrangement of the program of the Conference did their work well. Thus the first day's proceedings and addresses—except for quite inevitable references—had little to do with the subject proper of the Conference at all. The theme of the whole of the first day's addresses—morning, afternoon and evening—was the infallibility of the Word of God, and the impeccable, indisputable Deity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

At the morning session, Rev. Dr. Harris Gregg of Winnipeg struck the clarion note of the Infallibility of the Word. All the chief events of the Old Testament, he averred, point onward to Christ. They were not mere incidents in the history of an ancient people, but a constant and recurrent series of signs, types and prophecies concerning Him who should come. Christ is the Theme of the Scriptures, the Perfect Example of the Perfect Standard, and the Viewpoint of the Word of God. "All other books," said Dr. Gregg, "are the books of the dead. This—the Record of Christ Jesus the Lord—is the Book of Life. Christ says the Word cannot be broken. If a man say it can, then the debate is not between us who believe it cannot, but between that man and Jesus Christ."

At the afternoon session, the speakers were Rev. John McInnis, of Syracuse, Secretary of the Montrose Bible Conference, and Dr. Mark Matthews of Seattle. The former contended that the prophets of old spoke from God and for God. They did not originate their message, but carried along by the Holy Spirit, spoke God's mind and God's message. Dr. Matthews entered an eloquent plea for the acceptance of the assurance of Christ's Second Coming based on the evidence of prophetic fulfillment concerning His first Advent. The famous Western preacher was in fine form, earnest, emphatic, epigrammatic. Here is one of the things he said, something well worth pondering: "Where a church is true to the Infallible Word, souls are always being added to it. But wherever and whenever men have preached from an emasculated Bible, and proclaimed a mere social service Gospel, there is death in the pews and cobwebs in the house of God."

The evening session was addressed by Dr. William B. Riley of Minneapolis, president of the Northwest Bible School, and Dean William L. Pettingill of the Philadelphia School of the Bible. Dr. Riley spoke on the Church of God, the Christ of God, and the Kingdom of God, showing that to be the order of history and in conformation with God's plan for mankind. Dean Pettingill's able address was devoted to proclaiming that Christ came into the world to set forth the truthfulness of God, to fulfil the promises made to the fathers and that the Gentiles might glorify His Name and mercies. So, the opening day of this notable Conference came to a close, with everybody feeling assuredly that Christ indeed is Lord, and that the Word of our God standeth sure.

The Second Day's Meetings

THE absence of Dr. Charles I. Scofield, prevented by illness from attending the Conference, caused a widespread feeling of regret. A letter of condolence, prepared and read at the Tuesday afternoon session by Mr. Charles G. Trumbull, editor of the Sunday School Times, was forwarded to Dr. Scofield. His place and subjects were allotted to Dr. John M. MacInnis of Syracuse.

Wednesday's program was devoted to the general subject of The Return of Our Lord as related to Present-Day Conditions. Mr. W. H. Ridgway, of Coatesville, presided at the morning session, and the speakers were Dr. J. M. MacInnis and Dean James M. Gray of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago. Nearly two thousand people were present at the early hour of ten o'clock. This fine attendance, coupled with a total aggregate of nearly seven thousand for the three sessions on Tuesday, furnishes some idea of the magnitude and importance of this great gathering. Let no man doubt that the hearts of men and women are everywhere being extraordinarily stirred, and made to ponder on the deep things of God.

Mr. Charles M. Alexander (who conducted the musical end of the Conference) said, as the vast audience rose to sing one of his choruses—"I don't know of anything that would jam this great building full of people on a sizzling, hot day like this, except something relating to Jesus Christ."

Dr. J. M. MacInnis and Dean Gray both gave excellent addresses—the former dealing with the question of "Where Is Christ Now, and What Is He Doing?" the latter with "God's Purpose in This Dispensation." Dr. MacInnis dwelt on Christ's mediatorial work before the face of the Father, while Dr. Gray, in his usual concise and convincing fashion, showed how God's purpose in these days was to raise up a Church that He would one day call out from the world to be His Bride.

The afternoon session was presided over by Mr. Robert B. Haines, Secretary of the American Branch of the Scripture Gift Mission. The speakers were Rev. A. E. Thompson and Dean Gray. Mr. Thompson was pastor of the American Church in Jerusalem at the beginning of the Great War, but being a Canadian, was forced by the Turks to relinquish his charge. He spoke on "The Capture of Jerusalem," and delivered an exceedingly interesting address.

"The Germans may yet enter Paris," Mr. Thompson said, "though we should all weep to see them. The Huns may again sack Rome. The flag of the Allies may yet float over Berlin. Yet none of these things would be anything more than mere incidents in the unfolding panorama of the ages, and none of us could put a finger on a passage of Biblical prophecy which their occurrence fulfilled. But when the British flag was planted on the Tower of David, we realized that this was something that was spoken of by the prophets of old. The red crescent of the tyrannous Turk is gone forever from the minarets of the Holy City, and this"—waving a Union Jack—"floats in its place."

One of the real dramatic moments of the Conference was reached at this point, as an entire audience of three thousand rose en masse to greet the flag of their British ally.

DR. GRAY addressed the Conference on "The Regathering of Israel in Unbelief," and gave a masterly résumé of what, in his reading of unfulfilled prophecy, there yet remained to be accomplished ere the ultimate destiny of the Chosen People should be encompassed. "The Jew is the one nation for Palestine," Dr. Gray declared, "and he will go back in multiplied numbers, albeit in unbelief. There shall come upon him, and upon his nation, a period of dire calamity, followed by complete restoration and replenishment by God."

The Chairman of the evening session was Dr. Howard Kelly, the famous surgeon of Baltimore. The Academy was packed to its limit when he rose to take charge of the meeting. And how those people sang! After they had finished the "Glory Song," Mr. Charles Huston said that "never in his life had he heard such a glorious volume of praise." I am quite sure I never have, and it has been my privilege to hear very many wonderful audiences sing Gospel songs. Charles Alexander can make almost anybody sing, provided they possess a note at all. But he had little or no trouble with this crowd. They just sang, and sang, and sang, in glorious waves of happy harmony!

Rev. Dr. Cortland Myers, pastor of Tremont Temple, Boston, whose subject was "War on German Theology," delivered a whirlwind address. All his oratorical and critical big guns were trained on the object of his attack. Barbarism, ruthless warfare, and the utter disregard for even conventional civilization, which have marked the Teutonic military methods of the past three and a half years, he declared to be the inevitable harvest of rationalism and the particular brand of theology which has come to be known as "German."

"It is a moot question," he said, "whether the great war which is now burdening and devastating the world would ever have been commenced, had it not been for German theology. Its dire effects have not only influenced and swayed the land of its inception, but have corrupted the thinking of the very countries which are now engaged in deadly struggle with the forces of the Kaiser. Had the churches of Great Britain and America but tackled and stemmed the insidious flow of German theology fifty years ago, the world would not now be bathed in human blood."

Dr. Myers contended that the pivotal heresy of German theology surged around its denial of the Deity, the Eternal Sonship of Jesus Christ. This denial, he said, he had fought, was fighting, and would fight, even though the very vessel on which he fought went down under him. Christ was the world's only Redeemer—the Supreme Authority in Christian doctrine and belief. There was no Christianity, no power, no spiritual life, no hope, no victory, without an acknowledgment and acceptance of the Deity of Jesus Christ. He paid the Conference a great and significant compliment when he said: "I have had the honor and privilege of preaching the Gospel of the Son of God to thirteen millions of people; but this is the finest audience I ever saw at a religious convention in the whole of my life."

YET somehow, I could not help thinking that Dr. Myers protested too much. Rationalism—German Theology—call it what you will—is heinous enough, in all conscience—a thing to be guarded against, to be fought to the very death. Yet its effect is, I firmly believe, apt to be grossly exaggerated. Believers by the tens of thousands will have none of it, and reject it with justifiable scorn. No theory is less true than the theory that the great fundamentals are, one after the other, being destroyed—sacrificed to the modern mind. It is half-pathetic and half-humorous to listen to those who declare they have no alternative but to "guard the deposit" and who view themselves in the light of a small, forlorn and decreasing company who are making their last glorious but desperate stand around the central citadel of the faith. There is absolutely no question today of dying in the last ditch for the few relics of a once glorious faith left to us. Never in the sweep of the ages has the acknowledgment of Christ as Lord and King grown so marvelously as in recent days. In these heart-searching times, Christian men and women are crowding in with new experiences, new glimpses and revelations of the Divine Father's workings, new hints and suggestions, new dreams and visions of the unseen; and these, combined with the entrenched, ascertained truths of revelation, are composing and constituting the most glorious and august system of belief which the spiritual nature of mankind has ever been able to reach out after and understand. "Therefore every scribe that hath been made a disciple to the Kingdom of Heaven is like unto a man that is an householder who bringeth forth out of his treasury things new and old."

Dr. Myers' indictment of the iconoclastic theologians is fully justified, but I, for one, do not think we have need to be afraid. For such contingencies, those who hold to the glorious truth of Christ as Saviour, Redeemer and Coming King are, or ought to be, well prepared. Yet faith, to survive, must live by its daring, by its sublimity, by its immensity. Faith must justify itself by its eagle heart. It must grow in quality and force. Then shall its possessor possess his soul in confidence, and win fresh loyalties for the new, divine unfoldings and interpretations of that deathless message which was, once for all, delivered unto the saints.

For definite application to the subject allotted him, Rev. P. W. Philpot of Hamilton, Ontario, proved himself one of the really effective speakers of the Conference. There has been quite a little tendency among the platform addresses to wander, and some overlapping. The Canadian pastor, however, stuck manfully and praiseworthy to his text on each occasion he has delivered addresses. At the evening session of Wednesday his was the closing speech, the subject being "Coming Events Cast Their Shadows." Mr. Philpot reviewed the Jewish, economic, political, moral and spiritual signs of the times. He is a premillenarian but by no means a "fixed-day-and-date" man. Those who in days gone by had professed to know the definite hour of Christ's Coming, together with those who in our own time were claiming similar prescience, Mr. Philpot denounced as having made the doctrine of the Lord's Return both difficult and unpopular. Yet it was a significant fact that in larger numbers than at any previous time, the members of Christ's Church were turning to a study of latter-day prophecy, and to an acceptance of a belief in a large fulfillment of it in the world-convulsing events of the present day.

Pastor Philpot was very human. He spoke with point and feeling, and, without playing for it, won the sympathy of his great audience quite easily.

"I have three hundred and eighty members of my church in France and Flanders," he said. "Some of them are sleeping under the poppies; the others are in the battle-lines. I have four sons fighting in the Canadian Contingent, two of whom have been wounded three times, and a daughter nursing sick and wounded soldiers and sailors in a hospital at Lagos. And it is my belief in this blessed hope of Christ's Appearing, that keeps my head up and my heart from breaking. I claim the right to read the prophetic Scriptures in the light of current events, and from the process I gather great spiritual succor and solace in an hour of sore trial, anxiety and pain."

So ended a memorable day's gatherings. The attending crowds were wonderful. An overflow meeting was held in a nearby church in the evening, when Dean Pettingill spoke to more than a thousand people. This Conference is not being held in a corner, and the echoes of its doings are going to be heard after many days.

The Closing Sessions

THE closing sessions of this notable Conference furnished remarkable evidence of the unabated interest manifested in the subject which had brought it together. Fully eight thousand people were present at the three meetings. The specific phase which found discussion was "The Return of Our Lord in the Program of Prophecy."

President Wilson's Proclamation for a day of Humiliation and Prayer was read at the morning and evening sessions. Dr. Harris G. Gregg and Pastor Philpot were the morning speakers. Dean Pettingill (taking the place of Dr. Scofield) and Rev. B. B. Sutcliffe spoke in the afternoon, while Rev. Herbert Mackenzie and Rev. Dr. William B. Riley delivered the closing addresses of the Conference. All these men did admirably, exhibiting an excellent mastery of the various subjects allotted them, and, in the main, a quite praiseworthy tolerance and entire freedom from rabid, exaggerated statement and wild, unsupported conjecture. Indeed, the whole Conference proved to be a sane, sober, reverent and even conservative inquiry into the validity and authority of the great theme which had brought it together.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, ex-Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, in addition to addressing a noonday meeting in the Garrick Theatre, presided at the afternoon session. He described the Conference as one of the most significant events in modern Church history.

"Whatever success I have had as an evangelist," he said, "I trace to my definite acceptance of the great doctrine of the premillennial return of Jesus Christ."

Dr. Chapman led the Conference in a truly wonderful season of inaudible prayer. For nearly ten minutes, one could have almost heard a pin drop, as the vast assembly, at Dr. Chapman's behest, prayed "for the President, the Government, our Allies, and the mothers, fathers, sweethearts and wives whose hearts are sore and bleeding; for our soldiers, sailors, men of the air, and for our enemies."

The following resolution was read at the closing session of the Conference, and carried unanimously:

A Call for a World Conference

THIS Bible Conference on the return of our Lord, held at Philadelphia, this May 28th, 29th and 30th, 1918, adopts the following statement of belief.

"First: We believe that the Bible is the inerrant, one and final Word of God; and, therefore, is our only authority.

"Second: We believe in the Deity of our Lord Jesus Christ; that He is very God; and in His substitutionary death, as an atonement for sin; in His bodily resurrection and ascension; and the certainty of His second appearance 'without sin unto salvation.'

"Third: We believe that our Lord's prophetic Word is at this moment finding remarkable fulfillment; and that it does indicate the nearness of the close of this age, and of the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

"Fourth: We believe that the completed Church will be translated to be forever with the Lord.

"Fifth: We believe that there will be a gathering of Israel to her land in unbelief, and she will be afterward converted by the appearance of Christ on her behalf.

"Sixth: We believe that all human schemes of reconstruction must be subsidiary to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, because all nations will be subject to His rule.

"Seventh: We believe that under the reign of Christ there will be a further great effusion of the Holy Spirit upon all flesh.

"Eighth: We believe that the truths embodied in this statement are of the utmost importance in

The Farthest North School in the World

By
ROY A. ALDEN

AS the menacing icebergs that clogged the narrow bay leading into Point Barrow melted under the piercing rays of the May sun, the gray nose of a taut government boat chugged cautiously into this northernmost tip of Alaska. On the shore stood groups of natives, mixed with a few whites. Leaning against the railing on the port-bow, furl-clad and smiling, stood the "Big Chief of the White Race."

When the ship was landed the "Big Chief" jumped hastily ashore. The natives swarmed around to greet him as if he were a long-lost relative.

William T. Lopp, chief of the Alaska division of the United States Bureau of Education, who has done more than any other person to civilize the native, had arrived on one of his visits to one of the eighty-four native villages in Alaska where he has established government schools.

For twenty-seven years Lopp has sown the seeds of American civilization, education and mode of living among the 25,000 Aleuts, Eskimos and Indians of the Far North. His success is measured, not alone by the great educational system he has built across the vast expanses of Alaska, but by his exceptional popularity among the natives.

THE title Lopp bears in the North was affectionately bestowed upon him by the natives, with thousands of whom he is personally acquainted. First eyed with suspicion and scorn, Lopp has won the entire native population of Alaska to his side; and his course, first blocked with many obstacles thrown in his way by the native, is now virtually cleared.

Lopp maintains his headquarters in Seattle, Wash., and twice each year makes a swing around his Alaskan circuit. He reaches his destination in the best way possible. Sometimes he goes on a launch, tossing in the fierce current of a turbulent stream that cuts through the wild waves of an open bay; or by reindeer caravan or dog-team, winding his way through the snow-steeped trails, as the bitter northern winds lash his face.

An indomitable love for Alaska, and a determination to make the rays of American civilization and education shine in every igloo, hut or home in the native villages of the great northern territory, is responsible for his success. Outside of Alaska the wonderful results he has achieved are little known or appreciated, but in the Far North he is heralded as a big man who has accomplished big things. The white folks know him as an "empire-builder." The natives hail him as the "Big White Chief."

Mr. Lopp has 125 teachers, nurses and doctors under his direct supervision. Each teacher is a social worker who strives to promote the physical, moral and industrial welfare of the natives, besides her 100,000 square miles. The villages, ranging in population from thirty to 400, are scattered along thousands of miles of coast line and on the great rivers.

SOME of the villages on remote islands or frozen ocean are brought into touch with the outside world only once or twice a year when these emissaries of the government arrive. In eight months of the year all of the villages in Alaska, with the exception of those on the southern coast, are reached only over the snow-crusted trails or frozen rivers. No place is too isolated for Lopp or members of his staff to visit. Surmounting obstacles is part of their work.

The vagabondish native of Alaska has passed. Under the watchful eye of the government agents of education his mind has been trained, his barbarous traits have been downed, and he is now living a life of usefulness.

work in the classroom. It has always been the policy of Mr. Lopp to impart to the children such instruction as will enable them to live comfortably and to deal intelligently with those with whom they come in contact. Carpentry, cooking and sewing are emphasized in the school studies.

EVERY schoolhouse in Alaska is a social center for the accomplishment of practical ends. Most of the school buildings contain a recitation room, a kitchen, quarters for the teacher, a laundry and baths for the use of the native community. The schoolroom is always available for public meetings for discussion of affairs of the village.

The Alaska educational system is of an enormous extent. If the map of Alaska were superimposed upon the map of the United States, the public schools for natives would fall in twenty-one different states. There are five district superintendents. One of the districts contains fully

Strangling the Periodicals

CONGRESS at its last session passed a hasty postal law increasing the postage on periodicals from FIFTY TO NINE HUNDRED PER CENT THROUGH A POSTAL "ZONE" LAW. The postal "zone" system was abolished by Abraham Lincoln in 1863 on the recommendation of Postmaster General Blair and has since also been condemned by U. S. Postal Commissions.

UNDER the postal zone law some periodicals will be killed—all will be crippled. There will be fewer readers, and the habit of reading curtailed. The great functions of periodicals is to assist in the spread of ideas—by printing the achievements in the world of thought, culture, and science.

Thus to shut out farm journals—as these zone rates will—will lessen the productive power of our country by millions of dollars through loss of better methods. Shut off trade journals and you decrease the manufacturing power by more millions. Shut off the religious papers and there are shut off channels that have raised millions of dollars for distressed humanity. Shut off the great periodicals of the home and there is throttled an avenue that has given expert instruction to hundreds of thousands of mothers and saved their babies to health and citizenship.

These national periodicals are printed in the big cities—and the first zone, the cheapest zone, is in or near those cities; there are many educational opportunities near cities, and the cities will read anyway. Small towns and distant districts depend to a large extent upon periodicals; thus this law increasing periodical postage where it is most needed shuts off opportunity where needed. It penalizes periodical readers.

Congressman Claude Kitchin of North Carolina, who fathered it and compelled its adoption, refusing hearings on the measure—it had been twice defeated by the Senate—stated in his speech in Congress that it was not a War Revenue amendment but permanent postal legislation.

Canadian magazine readers, even to the Arctic Circle, can receive American magazines at four cents a pound postage. Every American reader—if they live west of Missouri—must pay almost twice as much postage, or from 4½ to 8 cents postage per pound for the same magazines! This is what the postal "zone" law means—discrimination against American citizens of all Western States. Do you live West of Missouri—of Minnesota, Iowa, Arkansas or Louisiana? Then this postal "zone" law discriminates against you and in favor of every Canadian reader to the shores of the Pacific and North to the Arctic Circle!

It is not a War Tax. It is postal legislation, pure and simple.

Repeal this law. Repeal this FIFTY TO NINE HUNDRED PER CENT periodical postage increase with its unfair, iniquitous and disastrous "zone" system. Sign the petition below and mail it. Put a cross mark in the square—save the periodicals and the work which they have done and are doing for national education and patriotism.

PETITION TO CONGRESS—Sign Here!

The spread of education, of culture, of scientific knowledge and advancement, and of our vast internal merchandising and manufacturing has been, and always is, vitally dependent upon the freest and cheapest circulation of periodicals. The penalties resulting from any restriction on the freest possible circulation of periodicals will be destructive of the best interests of our economic life and the opportunities of developing our best citizenship.

The postal amendment passed by the last Congress increasing the postage on periodicals from FIFTY TO NINE HUNDRED PER CENT with its postal "zone" system will throttle or destroy our periodicals at a time when the widest and most extensive circulation of publications is essential to the patriotism, education, and upbuilding of our country.

Therefore, I, the undersigned, do most earnestly demand the repeal of this burdensome periodical postage amendment.

President Wilson Asks for New Revenue Bill

ALL question as to whether or not Congress would pass a Revenue Bill to put the Treasury in shape to meet all requirements ended when, on May 27, President Wilson appeared somewhat unexpectedly before a joint session of the Senate and the House, and urged enactment at the present session of Congress of legislation to raise additional War Revenue. The President spoke for fifteen minutes, and when he finished, there was no doubt that Congress would extend the present session long enough to pass a well balanced and efficient Revenue measure, even though the campaign for re-elections went by the board.

President Wilson began by recognizing the long, severe, and valuable work of the present Congress, and by admitting also the difficulty of legislative work in summer. "But," he said, "we dare not go to the elections until we have done our duty to the full. These are days when duty stands stark and naked, and even with one's eyes closed, we know it is there. Excuses are unavailing. We have either done our duty or we have not. The facts are tonic and suffice to freshen the labor." The facts he said to be these: that additional revenues were manifestly necessary, and that it would be an unsound policy to raise too large a proportion of the New Revenue by loans; that the $4,000,000,000 to be provided by the present Revenue laws would not suffice to meet the enlarged budget which the government faced, and that it would be unfair to wait until the end of the year to pass laws taxing incomes and profits which are being earned during the year. The President said: "We cannot get increased taxes unless the country knows what they are to be, and practices the necessary economy to make them available. Early definiteness as to what these taxes are to be is absolutely necessary for the successful administration of the treasury." The President also declared that the present tax laws were marred by inequities which ought to be remedied. He also called attention to the fact that enormous loans, freely spent, produced inflations and extravagances, which made the whole economic structure questionable and insecure, a condition that could only be corrected by fair and equitably distributed taxation. He suggested the natural source of new revenue to be increased taxes on incomes, war profits and luxuries, but, he declared, it would be manifestly unfair to wait until the early months of 1919 to tax the incomes and war profits of 1918. He also called the attention of Congress to the fact that the taxes levied would not come into the Treasury until next June, and that in the meantime the Treasury must use short-time certificates to be taken up by the tax money when it became available, and in the fall a much larger sale of long-time bonds than any yet attempted must be offered to the country. He declared that it was necessary for the bankers who took Treasury certificates, to know where the money was coming from to pay them. He said, "the consideration that dominates every other now, and makes every other seem trivial and negligible, is the winning of the war. We are not only in the midst of the war, but we are at the very peak and crisis of it. Hundreds of thousands of our men, carrying our hearts with them and our fortunes, are in the field, and ships are crowding faster and faster to the ports of France and England with regiment after regiment, thousand after thousand, to join them until the enemy shall be beaten, and brought to a reckoning with mankind. There can be no pause or intermission. The volume of our might must steadily and rapidly be augmented until there can be no question of resisting; but if that is to be accomplished money must sustain it to the utmost. That," the President said, "is the situation which creates the duty. There is only one way to meet that duty. We must meet it without selfishness or fear of consequence. Politics is adjourned! The elections will go to those who think least of it; to those who go to the constituencies without explanation or excuses, with a plain record of duty faithfully and disinterestedly performed."

The President declared that there was abundant material on hand to defeat attempts of lobbyists to turn taxes to their protection or advantage. He declared also: "The profiteering that cannot be got at by the restraints of conscience and love of country can be and others had felt that a bill could be prepared by the Ways and Means Committee, and be made ready for prompt action, either at a special session to be called following the elections in November or in December, immediately on the convening of the regular session, Congressmen and Senators of both parties responded to the President's message by preparing cheerfully to spend the sumgot at by taxation." He declared his confidence that the members of the national legislature would begrudge the work to be done at Washington no more than the men begrudged theirs who lay in the trenches and sallied forth to death. He declared that the American people knew that the war must be paid for and were willing to bear the burden of the taxes, and that there need be no fear in levying taxes, so long as they were levied justly and the burden justly distributed. He said, "The great days have come when the only thing that they (the people) ask for or admire is duty, greatly and adequately done." And he closed: "Shall we grow weary when they bid us act?"

WHILE many members of Congress had felt that it was unwise because of possible partisanship to attempt a revenue bill before the elections, mer, or as much of it as might be necessary, in passing the great Revenue Bill, which all agree is now inevitable. The tax on war profits may go as high as 80 per cent. The French tax on luxuries has been a marked success, and it is expected that the French experience will be made use of in framing the new bill. Representative Claude Kitchin, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, said he would call his committee in session in a week or ten days.

It was also announced that the Committee would begin hearings at once, so that all persons or organizations or trades interested in or affected by the new taxes could be properly heard.

WAGES AND RATES UP. Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, as Director

General of Railroads, on May 26, issued a general order putting into effect the recommendations to the Railway Wage Commission with amendments, which brought the total of additional wages to be paid to railroad employees to something in the neighborhood of $340,000,000. The order established the 8-hour day for railroad employees, and provided that negro employees should receive the same pay as white employees for the same work, and that women should receive the same pay as men for the same work. In order to meet this increase in expense and other increases in operating costs, Director McAdoo, on May 27, issued an order increasing freight and passenger rates; freight rates by 25 per cent., and passenger rates to 3 cents per mile. These increases were estimated as capable of producing additional revenue of $860,000,000. Sleeping-car and parlor-car rates were to be heavily increased. Mileage books and excursion tickets were to be abolished, with few exceptions. The commuting rates were to be increased 10 per cent. The new passenger rates were to be made effective June 10, and the new freight rates June 25. The action was taken by Mr. McAdoo after a review of the facts by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it was announced that inequalities would be taken up later and considered. In addition to the increase in wages, the railways this year will pay $160,000,000 more for coal and fuel oil than four years ago. The Director-General declared that the United States had taken over the railroads as a war emergency measure, and they must be operated efficiently if the war was to be carried to a successful conclusion, and operated under the high costs which war conditions have created.

MEMORIAL AND SUPPLICATION. For the first time since its institution as a memorial, the boys in blue and gray on Decoration Day this year looked backward and forward to battle, backward to the battle which made the Union secure and which made every race and color equal before the law, and forward to the battles still to be in which liberty must triumph. Following the lead of the President, the nation, on May 30, met in its places of worship in humiliation of soul and in prayer for victory and the blessings of a just peace. The President attended the Central Presbyterian Church of Washington, and went in the afternoon to memorial exercises at Arlington National Cemetery. Everywhere the faltering but still sturdy steps of the veterans of the 60's were covered by the steady tramp of the boys in khaki, who were soon to fight the nation's battles on the fields of France. In France members of the expeditionary forces were up early placing flowers and the Stars and Stripes upon the graves of those who had already given their lives that men everywhere may be free. In England and Ireland, Memorial Day was observed wherever there were American troops or American dead.

RED CROSS $150,000,000 AND OVER. On May 28th the figures of the Second Red Cross Fund showed the total subscribed as $148,333,367, with subscriptions still being reported, there being every evidence that the final total would exceed $150,000,000.

GEN. WOOD KEPT FROM FRANCE. On the eve of sailing with the 89th Division of the National Army for France, Major Gen. Leonard Wood of the American Army was detached from his command and ordered to the command of the Western Military Department with headquarters in San Francisco. Gen. Wood immediately protested to Secretary Baker, and on May 28, by special appointment, held a conference with the President. No explanation of the action of the War Department was forthcoming, although it was suggested that Gen. Wood might not be in favor with Gen. Pershing, whom he outranks in the regular service, but under

The Empty Garden

CAN a garden, bursting with blossoms, crowded full of growing plants, be, after all, empty? Maybe you think not, maybe you think it can. Whatever you think, you will find the answer in next week's story by Ethelwyn Humphrey.

Frank Carpenter has heard the noise of many waters. He has heard the purr of whirling dynamos and the crack of the electric arc. Next week he will take us from the Zambesi to Niagara.

Next week, also, if the censor will release it, we will tell you more about the Red Cross expedition to Palestine with which the Christian Herald family is so closely allied through Major Theodore Waters, Secretary of the Christian Herald.

Also more pictures in Rotogravure, more Adventures in Neighboring, a message from a Pastor's heart to all the Good Soldiers of Christ and all the regular departments that serve you each week, with no other reward than the opportunity for service.

And the next week will come the rallying call to all the good friends of the Children's Home where childhood finds its recompense.

Germans Attack and Reach the Marne

SINCE April 29, when the Germans suffered their costly defeat south of Ypres, the world has been waiting to see where and when the great offensive, of which so much had been promised, would begin again. Military experts were divided. Some held that the Germans were committed to the attack on Amiens, of which the fighting in Flanders was merely a corollary; others held that the best strategy would be an attack at some other point of the line, while the British and French reserves were massed between Amiens and the sea. There seemed to be reasonable agreement that the next attack would be either along the Aisne, west of Rheims, where success would outflank the Allies on the line between Noyon and Montdidier, and make possible the widening of the salient pointing toward Amiens, at the same time threatening Paris from a new direction; or that a drive would be made in the Champagne country east of Rheims, where success would outflank the Verdun salient, and perhaps bring a second battle on the Marne.

On Sunday, May 26, the Germans began a heavy shelling of the British line, especially south of Albert and east and southeast of Amiens, although some attention was paid to the front northeast of Bethune. There was also a reasonable increase in raiding activity on both sides.

On Monday, May 27, after four weeks in which there were no major actions, the Germans suddenly delivered a terrific blow of massed forces on the French and British lines from Vauxaillon, north of Soissons to Brimont, north of Rheims, covering a front along the Ailette of some twenty-five to thirty miles running westward from Rheims to the Forest of St. Gobain, where nestled those monster guns which have been bombarding Paris, and which after an interval of two or three weeks of silence began again on May 27 to harass the French capital. Along this front, after an intense artillery fire, described as scarcely less violent than that of March 21 (which initiated the beginning of the great offensive), a bombardment marked by quantities of gas shells, the Germans again sent forward their dense waves of infantry, wave after wave supported by tanks against the waiting French and British. The force used was upwards of twenty-five divisions or from 250,000 to 325,000 men. While there has been no evidence that Gen. Foch had anticipated an attack at just this point, an attack was expected somewhere, and every sector was on the alert. In spite of the superiority in the air held by the Allies, the concentration of the German troops against the front attacked had not been reported officially although great German concentrations had been spotted at various centers back of the Somme front. It was apparent that the Germans had again to some degree succeeded in executing a surprise by suddenly deflecting their troops in the reserve depots from the Somme to the Aisne, an easy maneuver with the railways and highways at their command.

THROUGHOUT May 27 the British and French, the British three divisions at the eastern end of the line of attacks centering on Berry-au-Bac, and the French with four heroic divisions, fought desperately to stem the advance of the enemy. At the end of the day the British troops outnumbered more than three to one had retired to their battle positions on the sector to the right, and to their second line on the left, while the French holding the lines to the west of the British were forced to give some four miles of ground, permitting the Germans to reach the Aisne at Pont Arey, fourteen miles east of Soissons, and ten miles west of Berry-au-Bac. Later in the day Gen. Haig Cantigny, taking 200 prisoners and inflicting heavy casualties on the enemy at slight loss to themselves. The fighting lasted about forty-five minutes, and ended in a clean job which delighted our British and French Allies, who admired the hard hitting precision of the American attack. Several German counter-attacks were completely repulsed. Elsewhere along the line in the Woevre and in Lorraine, raids were repulsed and the artillery exchanges increased in intensity.

The Germans also, on May 27, attacked the Belgians in the sector between Ypres and the coast. The Belgians more than held their own in the engagements.

by the Germans cost them as much as possible of their precious man-power. On the 29th the German pressure was shifted from the center toward the two wings. The center gained some three miles southward from Fismes, while the wings advanced some six or seven miles, the British and French withdrawing to the positions, protecting Rheims on the northwest and to the western outskirts of Soissons, which the Germans held after an all-day fight in the streets. Soissons had been under artillery fire from the beginning of the drive, and had been evacuated of its civilian population and its hospital patients before the approach of the German armies.

On the 30th the Germans were unable to advance further on the flanks. They brought pressure to bear in the center and forced their way southward to Fere-en-Tardenois and Vezilly. By noon of the 31st they had approached to within two miles of the Marne, and there was some indication that Foch's reserves were being made ready to stop the German progress at this river, which gave its name to the first historic battle of the war.

The German report, on May 30, claimed the capture of 35,000 prisoners, large quantities of military material, ammunition depots, railway trains, hospitals, medical equipment, and a complete air-drome.

The German air service, which had been strangely missing from the Picardy and Flanders fronts, appeared in full force to guide the advance across the Aisne. The British and French airmen promptly accepted the challenge and the French report, on May 30, chronicled the destruction of 19 German machines, 2 balloons, and the damaging of 23 enemy airplanes. The French and British bombing squadrons were also busy on the old battle-field dropping explosives on bridges, crossings and concentration points.

The American troops which took Cantigny, maintained their positions intact against a series of energetic counter-attacks the last supported by tanks. The latest report is that there were 242 Germans taken prisoners. The American attack was made in cooperation with a fleet of 12 French tanks, which found little to do because of the accurate work of the American artillery. The Germans, on May 29 and 30, conducted several raids against the American positions in the neighborhood of Luneville and northwest of Toul. The American artillery, on May 30, scored a direct hit on a big ammunition dump east of St. Mihiel, the dump blowing up with a terrific explosion. On May 31 American raiding troops in the Woevre destroyed a German position.

A German attempt, on May 30, to raid Paris from the air was completely repulsed. The long-range gun shelled Paris again on May 30, killing and wounding 14 people.

On May 31 the Germans again attacked on both wings of the Aisne front. On their right they drove forward across the Ailette and along the Oise, between Vauxaillon and Noyon. The French fell reported that the Germans had crossed the Aisne and that the British had withdrawn their lines to conform to the new French front. North of Soissons, and west of Pont Arey, French troops appeared to be holding their own against the German attack, although the German bulletins claimed capture of the entire Chemin des Dames.

On May 28, the British and French were reported to be falling back slowly, in conformity with orders of Gen. Foch, making the Germans pay a terrific price for their gains, and on the western end of the line it was said that the arrival of reserves had put an end to the withdrawal.

Some months ago there were American troops in training with the French along the Chemin des Dames, but neither the reports of the 27th nor those of the 28th of May made any mention of American forces in action on this front.

As a part of the activities of the day the Germans also attacked along a 6-mile front in Flanders, between Loere and Voormezele. Here they gained slightly south of Diekebusch Lake, on a front of about 800 yards. British and French counter-attacks restored the positions and the net results of two days' fighting was another costly check.

AMERICAN troops in the sector west of Montdidier in Picardy were also attacked on May 27, after a violent artillery preparation. The enemy penetrated the advanced positions at two points and was driven out by counter-attacks. The Americans did not let Fritz take any comfort from his attack and penetration of their lines, west of Montdidier, but, taking the offensive themselves, on May 28, on a front of a mile and a quarter, they swept into and around and through the village of

In order to make the day's story complete, the Italians took the offensive west of Trent, capturing the summit of Monte Zigolon, the town of Presna, Monticello Pass and a mountain spur east of the pass, taking beside the geography some 800 prisoners, twelve cannon and 25 machine-guns. The Italians, on May 28, struck again at the Austrians at Capo-sile, on the lower Piave front, penetrating to a depth of more than 750 yards, taking over 450 prisoners, four trench motors, ten machine-guns and much other military material, and maintaining the positions against all counter-attacks.

THE fighting of May 28 on the Aisne gave the Germans a total penetration of nearly ten miles south from Craonne, their storm troops driving forward across the Aisne at Pont Arey and over the intervening heights to Fismes on the Vesle, a stream which parallels the Aisne for a number of miles and joins it west of Vailly. The British, however, held their ground at Berry-au-Bac and the French held north of Soissons.

Late on the 28th, or early on the 29th, the British retired from Berry-au-Bac to within about four miles of Rheims and the French retired to the environs of Soissons where they held firmly. On the 29th, the French and British and some American reserves were coming into action, and the German advance appeared to have been slowed down almost to a halt. The Germans, on May 28, claimed the capture of 15,000 prisoners.

THE desperate battle on the Aisne front continued throughout May 29 and 30, the French and British troops retiring in good order, fighting delaying actions, and making the progress won

The President on War Taxes

PRESIDENT WILSON argues soundly and convincingly when he says that since we are at the "very peak and crisis of the war" we must have more war revenues and that Congress cannot in fairness wait until the end of the fiscal year to apprise the people of the taxes they must pay on their earnings of the calendar year whose accountings and expenditures will then be closed.

Opposition to present consideration of the new revenue measure has been confessedly based on fear of the political effect of the new tax burdens. Members seeking reelection would prefer to face their constituents before rather than after the record has been made. This is short-sighted.

President Wilson reads the hearts and minds of the people more accurately. The people know that war is expensive. They know that if we spare money now we shall only have to spend all the more later. They will blame no Representative who votes for an intelligent, just measure of taxation adequate to the Nation's extraordinary need.

In the virile phrase of the President, "politics is adjoined."

Whether a candidate for Congress be Republican or Democrat is of little consequence now so long as he is a good enough American to perform his duty.

Dull of comprehension is he who hesitates to vote for reasonable taxes that are needed for the winning of the war because of doubt that the people will support him.

The American people are all right in this matter and can be depended on to rebuke and repudiate not the Congressman who does his full duty in voting just taxes but the one who fails to do so.

There is no better practical politics than true patriotism.

The Shining Virtue of Generosity

COMPARATIVELY few, even among the kindest and most helpful, estimate at its full value the worth of a generous heart. There are some who regard the generous person as an easy mark for covetous schemers, and others see in him a half-brother to the spendthrift. Those who so judge have not learned to distinguish between the generosity which scatters wealth for amusement or for vanity or sheer love of notoriety, and the sort that gives with gladness yet unostentatiously though not without discrimination and always with a worthy object in view. Of the many millions of Americans who within the last few weeks have given so splendidly to the great causes for which this nation stands, the public will probably never know the names of more than a few hundred. They were not self-seeking, nor playing for the world's applause. They know too that a virtue practiced in the limelight, loses half its value; if not all.

Hear what the wise king in Scripture says of the generous-hearted:

"There is that scattereth and increaseth yet more; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth only to want. The liberal soul shall be made fat; and he that watereth shall be watered also himself."

These words from the eleventh chapter of Proverbs are worth remembering. It shows that generosity is in the highest sense a good investment, yet only where it is practiced without expectation of return, while the niggardly soul which clutches its wealth tighter at every call, finds it dwindling in his grasp.

Mr. Kitchin's Sad Lament

CONGRESSMAN KITCHIN from North Carolina, chief sponsor for the "zone" postage inquiry, bitterly laments in a long speech the fact that President Wilson and Secretary McAdoo want his pet measure wiped out of the statutes.

Mr. Kitchin pretends to see "a hidden, unseen influence, way back somewhere," acting upon the President and Secretary of the Treasury and turning them against his measure.

In this Congressman Kitchin overlooks two very important facts. The first is that Woodrow Wilson even before he became President declared himself vigorously against any periodical postage increase, giving good reasons and adding: "Surely sober second thought will prevent any such mischievous blunder." The second fact overlooked by Mr. Kitchin is that it is the sober second thought of the nation which is now producing the "hidden, unseen influence" he decries.

It is well known that the desks of members of Congress from many of the states are loaded down with letters from their constituents protesting against the sectionalizing zone postage system. Congressman Kitchin, since he represents a section of a state in which only a fraction over four per cent. of the people read periodicals, may escape this popular appeal and not appreciate its meaning and force.

It was this same Congressman Kitchin who announced that the present revenue law was full of inequalities but he would vote for it with his "eyes shut." Shut eyes seem to be characteristic of Mr. Kitchin still. The President's clearly expressed disapproval and the inrolling tide of public protest against the "zone" iniquity find Kitchin in the same state of voluntary blindness.

Perils of the Tongue

IT is said of Rev. William Arthur, of England, the author of the celebrated book, "The Tongue of Fire," that he was able to pray in half a dozen languages, to preach in half a hundred more, and that he was able to hold his tongue in all languages. Is not this a remarkable Christian achievement? The apostle James writes: "The tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity, it is set on fire of hell; behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth." He who by divine aid succeeds in controlling this unruly, untamable member, wins a victory worthy of emulation.

An old wife said to her husband, as he was driving the team to market, "My dear, why can't we live together as peaceably and harmoniously as these two old horses?" He replied: "I will tell you why; they have only one tongue between them." Families that have a tongue apiece among them, and sometimes all on fire, are liable to kindle a great conflagration, which often spreads over many countries of the world, while it takes other peoples years of struggle to make mankind safe from such burnings.

Speak evil of no man, is a commandment hard to obey, but if the heart be pure, the words will not offend, for out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh. Yet we see statesmen maligning each other in a way that shames their dignity and impairs their influence. It is said that a certain statesman lost the presidency because he gave another eminent American a tongue castigation which was never forgotten. It was a high price to pay for the privilege of unbridled freedom of utterance for a few minutes. How many pay big money for failing to hold the tongue at the right time and place!

World-Wide Advance in Prices

PRACTICALLY the whole world has participated in the advance in prices which has accompanied the war. From the peaceful banana plantations of Central America, the rice fields of the Orient, the sheep ranges of Australia, the silk-worm establishments of Japan, the sugar plantations of Cuba, the tin mines of the Malayan Peninsula, the olive fields of Spain, the swine ranges of China and the bean plantations of South America and Manchuria, the advance in prices has been general, and in nearly all important articles of commerce.

In a few articles, very few, there is no advance, and in some an actual decline. Coffee, coming to us from forty different countries and colonies of the world, chiefly from Latin America and the Orient, showed an average market price in February, 1914, of 11.2 cents per pound, and in February, 1918, an average price of but 8.1 cents per pound. Cocoa, coming from a score of countries and colonies, averaged in February, 1914, 11.7 cents per pound, and in February, 1918, 10.8 cents per pound. Even India rubber, in which the world output has more than kept pace with the greatly increased world demand, shows a slight decline, the average market price having been in February, 1914, 52.2 cents per pound, and in February, 1918, 47.8 cents per pound.

A compilation shows that the prices of the merchandise being exported from all parts of the world have increased in most cases from 50 to 100 per cent. above those prevailing before the war, and are materially higher than those of one year ago.

Training in Thrift

MYRON T. HERRICK makes the impressive statement that, despite competition by the government, the drain of subscriptions to war loans and the enormously increased cost of living, the deposits in the savings banks have grown. Said Mr. Herrick:

"We are a wasteful people, but we have nevertheless had enough money stored up to oversubscribe every recent government bond issue, besides buying hugely of thrift stamps and contributing millions to Red Cross and other charities. At the same time, contrary to popular impression, deposits in our savings banks have been on the increase, so that today these combined deposits represent $10,000,000 more than the entire amount of actual money in the United States. As regards life insurance and the owning of houses, too, the American people are unsurpassed."

While this qualifying situation is no excuse for past extravagance, it is a good augury for the future. But we still waste too much.

"Home Mending"

PERHAPS there may be something worth working out in the "home-mending" plan suggested by a Chicago minister, who finds that we have an abundance of homes, asylums and societies devoted to the care of persons variously in need, "but we have no association whose duty it is to conserve the most sacred of all institutions—the family."

If a husband and wife, for instance, disagree and are in danger of separation, one of the "home-menders" may call, talk things over with an outsider's dispassion, and perhaps save the household from disruption.

In theory, this is fine. But in practice it would require tactfulness that is rarely to be found. It would have to be clearly recognized in the first place that husband and wife reserve the right to fall out, if they see fit, as one of their most precious privileges. People marry "for weal or woe," and if they want the woe it is in the contract and is their right.

The outsider who interferes might as well realize this important fact at the start. He will have to realize it before the end. It would be better for him and all concerned that he should take some good sense in with him at the door than bring experience out with him through a window.

If the right envoys can be found, and if they succeed even once in a while in their tranquilizing mission, the result will more than recompense their being many times told to mind their own business.

It can certainly be no worse to talk over matrimonial jars with a friendly arbitrator, in the privacy of a home, than to air them in a divorce court.

Progress of Municipal Ownership

BOSTON has led the way in furnishing to other municipalities a practical application of the principle of municipal ownership. In behalf of the people, the Massachusetts municipality has taken possession of the elevated railroad system. Seven cities and three towns in the suburbs which are served by the system, will share in the change. Times are changing rapidly when such a transformation, which only a few years ago was regarded as a remote possibility, can take place in a day. It is by no means improbable that progressive civic spirit may at no distant date find a way to the municipalization in our cities of markets, lighting and water supply, as well as transportation. The national government is even now considering the acquisition of the telegraph and telephone systems and may go even further. These are days of progress and each successive step indicates the decline of the old system of owning and controlling public utilities for private profit. Meanwhile, Boston leads: which city will be the next?

Railroad Rate Increases

THOUGH the increases of 25 per cent. in freight rates and to three cents a mile for passengers must add to the burdens Americans are carrying, the additional weight will be taken on cheerfully so long as the country is assured that results will be forthcoming to aid in the efficient conduct of the war.

For the rest, the public should find food for no little thought and encouragement in Secretary McAdoo's point as to the vital distinction which makes these increases "fundamentally different from any rate increases ever proposed or allowed when the railroads were under private control."

This distinction is that there is no way in which the present increases will inure to private profit. If they turn out to be more than are needed to meet the grave public exigency, they will be promptly readjusted so as to prevent any unnecessary burden upon the public; but pending such readjustment, the excess, if any, will be for the benefit of the people of the United States as a whole and not for the benefit of private railroad owners.

Government control of railroads during war may teach more than one lesson as to how railroads can be managed so as to lay fewer unnecessary burdens upon the public in times of peace. If so, such lessons will be worth many millions of dollars of present cost.

A Church Festival in the Caucasus

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

Received through American Diplomatic Mail. Passed by Russian Censor

A FEW miles south of the snow-ridge of the Caucasus, next door to Europe, but actually in Asia, there is a wretched little village whose fame should be world-wide. Beneath its terraced homes two rivers unite; the clear, cold Aragwa, hastening from its birthplace in the eternal snows of the Caucasus to the hot depression of the Caspian, and the Kura, sullied and dirty, swinging in from the west to make its way across the barren Transcaucasian steppe, between the mountains of Daghestan and the Armenian highlands. The Kura, reinforced by the Arax, is the only stream with enough vitality to make its way across that desolate waste of barren land; yet where it meets the Aragwa, it is the meaner river of the two.

Mtzkhet is the name of this peninsula-town. Only a Russian, with ample whiskers, can really pronounce the word. Mtzkhet reminds one of a six-pound colored baby being called George-Washington-Abraham-Lincoln-Woodrow-Wilson Jackson. There is really nothing in the peaceful and dirty little village to compare with the militant aggressiveness of its name.

Mtzkhet has claims to antiquity that make the oldest New England town appear as a mere baby; for its citizens assert that it was founded by one of Noah's sons, who strolled over from Mount Ararat one day and chose this site because of its excellent drainage. The town looks old, to say the least. Damascus has a verdant freshness about it that is as deceptive as grease paint, but Mtzkhet stands out from green fields and pastures new, like a weathered, sharp-bowed fishing smack in an emerald sea.

ON a high rock cliff opposite Mtzkhet, the kings of Georgia erected their first castle, but it was in Mtzkhet itself that Georgia was born. The Georgians admit their descent from the Accadians and Sumerians, which gives them a place among the "first families," but there is nothing in the appearance or character of a Georgian to indicate his descent. Militant in appearance, handsome of countenance, haughty of manner, a hater of toil and a lover of wine, pleasure and song, the Georgian peasant is as much a prince as the great unwashed Bedouin in his desert tent. It takes something to make a ragged peasant look like a king, and the Georgians have it. Part of them are mountaineers—the most picturesque brigands that ever carried an arsenal at their belts. The rest are agriculturists. The Georgian treats his wife and daughters well, and Georgian women never act as servants. There is so much strength in the Georgian face that the women lose their greatest charm by the time they reach full maturity.

ABOUT 347 A. D., St. Nina established a Christian church in Mtzkhet, which was for many years a center of Christian culture. The Georgians assert that they were Christians before the Armenians, but the princely but spendthrift Georgians and the oppressed but thrifty Armenians have been much mixed throughout their history. Today there are persons who call themselves Georgians and who speak Georgian but who attend the Armenian church, while Armenians, speaking their own language, are often found in Georgian churches. Throughout history, there has never been any real trouble between these two races except under Russian rule, when rich and influential Armenians, the Georgians claimed, stood too close to officialdom and oppression. Since the fall of autocracy in Russia, this cause of misunderstanding no longer exists and the proud Georgian capital of Tiflis is practically owned by Armenians today.

The Russian Armenians and the Georgians are disposed to unite in national aspirations; but the Turkish Armenians look with disfavor at the re-establishment of the ancient boundaries of Georgia, and hope to set up their own government, stretching from Erivan to Alexandretta, straddling the important Bagdad Railway and interposing themselves between Turkish-speaking Asia Minor and Arabic-speaking Syria.

For about a hundred years the Georgian people have been without a Catholicos, an exarch from the Russian Church having served in the meantime. We visited Mtzkhet on a historic day and witnessed the investiture of a new Catholicos by the Georgian Church—an event which marks entire religious autonomy in a country which is too proud to admit that they ever lost it. Meanwhile, in Moscow, a solemn Sobor is planning closer union among the many varied sects into which Russian worshippers are so fond of dividing. Every train coming into Mtzkhet was packed almost to suffocation. On the roofs were crowds of young men. The station enclosure was a scene of vivacity and brightness. But it was not until the procession from the tiny station to the massive church was formed that order appeared. At the head of the line was a fine blue banner, inscribed with Georgian characters in silver, above which there was a silver disc bearing the picture of some great saint. The banner-bearer was dressed in soft black boots, a dark brown tcherkeshka, with its narrow waist and flowing skirts, sword, dagger and cartridge-cases of oxidized silver, with an automatic pistol in its new russet case at his hip and a small Georgian skull-cap on his head. He was flanked by two swordsmen in wine-colored plush doublets edged in soft fur, scarlet trousers, soft white leather boots with gold tassels and anklets of soft white leather, trimmed with narrow stripes of red. Behind came a group of thirty or more singers, wearing the small Georgian cap, which seems to be kept in place by the personal magnetism of its wearer. Their doublets were wine-colored and edged with gold braid, but their silk trousers were bright blue. Beside them walked a handsome young man, designs. Their wiry but small horses sniffed at the fumes from the motor car.

Fancy dress gave way to the usual garb in the band of mountaineers, with batty tcherkeshkas and reversed carbines, who followed. They were a fitting part of the scene of tiny river and autumn-tinted hills, and had all the dash and majesty of true bandoleros. They sat their horses like knights. The end of the procession was formed of priests on horseback and laymen in autos. Behind streamed the crowds of city folk from the Golovinski Prospekt.

AS the party approached the crumbling crenellated walls that surround the towering church, the visitors halted to let the officials pass. Men in Panama hats, frock coats and button shoes stood behind rosy-cheeked schoolgirls in simple sailor dresses. Veiled beauties stood side by side with peasant women whose faces had a nobility which needed no purple veil to enhance its appeal. The broad space before the ancient church was parked with big motor-cars.

Inside the massive church, erected on the spot where the unseamed vesture of the Christ was found (after having been brought thither from Golgotha by a Jew as the tradition tells), there lie buried many of the kings of the proud but ill-fated Georgian line, the last of whom, George XIII, ceded his territory to Russia in 1801 and died that year, broken-hearted. Sixteen centuries have passed since the first Christian church was built on that site. Mtzkhet is ancient, but it is only a way station on the great highway of history.

The interior decorations of the church are simple in the extreme. The Russians systematically destroyed the old frescoes. There are many dim old paintings on canvas dating from the fourteenth to the seventeenth centuries, but there is no such ornate display as distinguishes the Russian churches. The simple ikonostas of carved and gilded wood, to the left of which lies the body of George XIII, is plain and unpretentious.

UNDER the great conical dome, the new Catholicos was invested with impressive ceremonies. The fine-looking old man, his white head bowed a little below the massive gold mitre with its round crown, wore a priceless old vestment of fawn-colored figured silk. Huge priests in golden robes and with flowing manes aided in the service. Around this central group of ecclesiastics stood several Georgian princes in tcherkeshkas. The whole scene was one of militant and medieval ecclesiasticism.

Like many another auspicious religious occasion, the religious character of the affair was almost lost in the mass of other features. Easter Day in Jerusalem has a religious significance to the worshippers, but to many curiosity-seekers it is simply a show. So it was at Mtzkhet.

Real gaiety and spontaneous enjoyment prevailed. To be sure, there were sellers of quinces and grapes, roasted chickens and chestnuts, peaches and apples, but they were incidental to the real event. Joy overflowed in the great courtyard. On one side of the courtyard were the Gruzian Regiment of handsome young men in eerie caps and epaulettes, yellow dress cords, blue trousers and black boots, polished at the top, but dusty from the long walk over the country road. They gave no sign of being starved. Black bread in huge hunks, filling rather than delicate, red caviar and red wine, bologna, mutton on spits, smoked sturgeon from Astrakhan, pickles and brown paper napkins filled the table. We were hailed by one group of young men and urged to partake of their merry hospitality. We had risen at five and eaten nothing since, and what we lacked in language we made up for in appetite. With two thumbs together in the way that an Oriental signifies man and wife, the young men spoke of the union between America and Russia. Much as the Georgians desire autonomy, their discipline remains as it was before the revolution, and they share with the Cossacks the reputation of being Russia's finest fighting men. The worst penalty for a young Georgian soldier, however, is to transfer him to a Russian regiment.

who sang the leads in a clear tenor, and who was dressed in the tcherkeshka and the lambskin papach, which can add to the height of the short or the jauntiness of the gay. With the men singers, were several lovely young women, wearing their hair in Marguerite braids. Over close-fitting bodices of figured silk in soft tints of gray and blue, they wore flowing velvet cloaks of delicate blue material, edged in fur. Their skirts, of queenly length, were paneled in the same soft-tinted material as composed their bodices, and their soft boots were hidden except for the shapely toes. Beside the procession walked Tiflis women dressed in the styles of the Place de l'Opéra or Fifth Avenue, but the maids outshone them all.

BEHIND this group of singers, along the dusty road to the wretched little village, purred a huge motor-car, bearing dignity and repose in the persons of the noble Catholicos and three companion prelates. Forming a daisy chain about this center of attraction were two-score or more lovely Georgian girls. Most of them were dressed in simple white, against which their raven hair and rosy cheeks showed in lively contrast, but there were a few in tailored suits and small but attractive hats copied from the latest Paris fashion sheet.

Then came the Khevsurs, burly descendants of some Frankish Crusaders, who forgot the Holy Grail in the midst of Georgian loveliness. Their coats of chain-mail gave back no glint of the brilliant sun, and their stocky faces, almost hidden in chain helmets, lacked the classic beauty of the Georgians. Their straight swords were two-edged, and each carried a shield as large as a dinner plate, decorated in repoussé

The Compassion of Jesus

A SERMON BY REV. GORHAM EASTERBROOK*

TEXT—Matt. 14: 14. "And Jesus went forth, and saw a great multitude, and was moved with compassion toward them, and he healed their sick."

THESE words do not indicate an occasional mood of Jesus, nor a sudden and passing emotion. They present the constant attitude and the invariable feeling of Jesus toward men. The compassion of Jesus is the expression of God's compassion toward men. The Old Testament says much about the compassion of God. He manifested his compassion to Israel. The record reads: "Their heart was not right with him, neither were they steadfast in his covenant. But he, full of compassion, forgave their iniquity and destroyed them not; yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath. For he remembered that they were but flesh." Over and over again the record declares God to be full of compassion, gracious and long-suffering, and plenteous in mercy. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him. He remembereth our frame; he considereth that we are dust." But it remained for Jesus to bring in his own person the greatest proof and the highest expression of God's compassion. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son."

That great prophecy which Jesus, at the beginning of his public life and ministry, claimed for himself, he wondrously fulfilled: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, for he has anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he has sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord."

THE ministry of Jesus was one of compassion. "I have compassion on the multitude." This was his habitual attitude, his invariable feeling. The expression indicates that the whole being of Jesus was profoundly moved as he regarded the multitude. His heart was full of intense yearning. The scene is an oft-repeated one in his life. Now, it is a weary, hungry, fainting multitude that calls forth the expression and exercise of his compassion. Again, the sick are the object of his compassion expressed in healing mercy and power. Now, his compassion opens the eyes of the blind. Now, he cleanses the lepers, indicating thus his compassion for sin-defiled men. Now, he casts out evil spirits, thus showing his compassion for those who are enthralled by evil. Now, he stands at the grave with the sorrowing and weeps with them, calls an only brother back to mourning sisters, or raises and restores an only son to his widowed mother, thus showing his compassion for all who mourn the loss of dear ones.

Thus everywhere and always Jesus stands before us as full of compassion. And he has in no respect changed. His attitude and feeling are the same as when he was on earth. "I will send you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever." In the Divine Comforter, the Holy Spirit, the compassionate Christ is still in the world, and ministers his compassion to men. He is still touched with all the feelings of human infirmities.

CHRIST has compassion for men as human beings. His compassionate treatment of man emphasized man's superiority and worth. Recall that occasion when Jesus had healed a man on the Sabbath. At this, because of their formal and heartless religion, which exalted forms and rules above men, the Jewish rulers murmured. But Jesus reasoned: "If a man have a sheep fall into a pit on the Sabbath, what man will not rescue him? Of how much more value is a man than a sheep?" Significant question, and one that needs emphasizing today. In this materialistic age there is great danger that man may be regarded as of no greater value than an animal. In the intense struggle of life, or the inordinate desire for riches, the fierce competition which these create in business method and spirit, in the complicated and often strained relations between men and nations; in the customs and demands of society; in the attempt of some men to make profit out of the weaknesses and vices of others; in the willingness of some to prosper by the adversity of others; in many ways, there is seen to be tremendous significance in Christ's question: "Of how much greater value is a man than a sheep?"

corporation with the inhumanity of packing men and women into a car in a way which would not be tolerated in the transportation of cattle. And if the learned judge had been called upon to do so, he might have cited many instances where man is treated with less consideration than animals. While it may be true that in some respects more is done today than ever before for the comfort and welfare of mankind, yet in other ways the neglect and abuse of man by man are painfully evident. There is very great need that we look upon men, and deal with men, in the spirit of Jesus, and have compassion on the multitude.

CHRIST has compassion on men because of the needs of their nature. In his human kinship with man, Christ knew the physical experiences of man. He knew by his own experience hunger, thirst, weariness, pain and sorrow. Therefore, when he looked upon the multitude that had been all day without food, and knew that they must journey far before they could procure food, and that many of them would suffer and perhaps perish, his heart was "moved in compassion for them," and, though hungry and weary himself, he would neither eat nor rest until he had ministered to the fainting people. With less compassion and little faith, his disciples had said: "This is a desert place, and the time is now past; send the multitude away, that they may go into the villages and buy themselves food." But he replies: "They need not go away." How evident that infinite love, infinite power, infinite supply were there in the person of Jesus. Surely they need not go away. And he who would not work a miracle for himself, who refused when hungry, and tempted, to exercise his divine power to provide himself with bread, now in compassion for suffering men, exercises his divine power to feed the hungry people.

What an example of unselfishness! What a lesson of thoughtful compassion! How is power multiplied and glorified by love! How often we refuse or neglect to help the needy, giving as an excuse, that we have nothing, or only enough for ourselves! The real trouble is that we have not love. We may have good wishes and sentiments, but these do not supply real needs. In our lack of love and our selfishness, we have such an exaggerated idea of our own necessities, that while we have far more than we need, yet we seem to ourselves to have but little, and our selfish reply to the appeal of human want is: Let them go and provide for themselves. How little of the compassion of Christ is seen in many who bear his name!

WHAT does Christ say of such a selfish proposal? By his bounty and his love he says: "They need not go away. Give ye unto them." How? Bring what you have. Give what you can. I will use it and multiply it, so that the needy shall be supplied, and you yourself receive a blessing. What if we refuse? Remember that day and scene and the Saviour's words of condemnation: "Depart from me; for I was hungry and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty and ye gave me no drink: I was a stranger and ye took me not in: naked and ye clothed me not: sick and in prison and ye visited me not." But when, Lord? "Inasmuch as ye did it not unto one of the least of these, ye did it not unto me." We need not indulge any large expectation of heaven hereafter, unless we do what we can to make human life a little more heavenly here and now.

BUT we miss the deepest significance of Christ's compassion, if we see in his feeding of the multitude only a desire to relieve their physical need. It was always of the spiritual needs of man that Christ most thought even while he ministered to their bodily needs. Beneath the physical craving of the people he saw the spiritual hunger. Within the fainting body he saw the weary soul. Hence, while he fed the body, he proclaimed and offered himself to the famishing soul as the Bread of Life, come down from heaven. As he broke the bread and gave to men for their bodies, so he gives himself to the souls of men as spiritual food for spiritual hunger and spiritual life, with the assurance that whosoever partakes of him shall never hunger and never die.

It is a sad fact of human experience that with all the supply at hand, and the oversupply of many, multitudes should suffer for the necessities of life. But while physical needs are real and should be supplied, the deepest needs of man are spiritual, and the saddest sight of human life is the moral degradation and spiritual poverty in which thousands of our fellow creatures are suffering and dying, while Christ in his love and bounty is saying to those who bear his name, "Give ye them to eat."

The deepest need of humanity is spiritual. The whole world is faint and famishing with spiritual hunger. In his compassion, Christ places himself at our disposal, first that our hunger may be appeased and our souls may live; next that we may make him known and offer him to others who, without him, must spiritually starve and die. How can we hope for his mercy and forgiveness, if we feed on him, and then refuse to carry the Bread of Life to hungry and dying souls? Here is the mission of the church to the starving world. As the disciples were the medium through which Christ, in his compassion, fed the people, so Christians today are to be the bearers and distributors of Christ himself, the Bread of Life, to the famishing and dying souls of men and women. His command is not to send them away, but through him and with him, to feel them and restore them.

JESUS has compassion on the multitude because of their ignorance. Mark, in his account of this scene, says the Lord had compassion on them and taught them many things. We have no difficulty in determining what he taught them. His teaching was not at all like that of their religious teachers—discussions about the law, traditions of men, questions of custom, form and ceremony, things which could not instruct, interest, or help them in their hour of need. His teaching was the glad tidings of the Gospel. Graciously and assuringly, he spoke to them of God in terms so simple that they could easily understand. Lovingly he told them of Salvation and instructed them in the things of the Kingdom. To the careworn and weary he brought new strength and comfort saying: "Be not anxious, but trust in God, who knows what things you need." To the heavily burdened he offered rest; to the sorrowing he offered peace; to the sinful he spoke of pardon. Thus he dissipated the ignorance which was the cause of their spiritual blindness and distress. As the Light of Life to them he revealed the great truths of God, and illumined the way so that they might no longer walk in darkness.

WE live in an age which boasts much of its knowledge and wisdom. It is called an age of enlightenment. Education is popular and accessible. Schools, colleges, universities, libraries, and many institutions of learning abound. And all this is very well in itself, for certain purposes of life. But there is another side to all this. Much wisdom of a material sort there may be; but at the same time and in the same persons who have much material knowledge, there may be and often is an appalling ignorance of God and spiritual things—the things that bring peace and joy and salvation to the soul. This ignorance is so great, and is the cause of so much sin and distress, that he who looks upon the multitude with the spirit of Jesus must feel as Jesus felt—compassion for them and a desire to seek their instruction. Knowledge cannot save the soul. Science cannot remove sin. Philosophy cannot bring us into fellowship with God. Science cannot show men how to get to heaven. How pitiable the condition and need of those who are wise in many things, yet not wise unto salvation! This is the condition and need of vast multitudes in the world today. The compassion of Jesus constrains us to teach these multitudes the things which he taught, that they may not perish in their ignorance.

JESUS has compassion on the multitude because of their lack of right leadership. He said of old: "I have compassion on the people because they are scattered abroad as sheep without a shepherd." Is it not so today? Is not this the prevailing condition of humanity? What an age is this of religions misnamed and misleading, of organizations and associations, of false leaders, each and all professing to seek the welfare of man, but whose secret purpose, like that of the false shepherd, is to fleece the sheep. Therefore does Christ offer himself as the true Shepherd, knowing his sheep and known of them, calling them by name, leading them in green pastures and by still waters, restoring them when fainting and protecting them from all harm. Let it be our task to bring wandering and weary souls under the shepherding care of Him who ministers both to soul and body, and who lays his healing hand in love and compassion upon the diseased and suffering.

May Jesus fill our hearts with like compassion. The least we can do is to minister to the physical needs of men and alleviate their bodily sufferings; but if our ministry stops there, it will stop just short of what men most need.

Sinner, Christ himself calls you. Arise, come to him, and he in compassion will forgive and heal you.

Largeness of Heart

SUNDAY, June 16. 1 Kings 4 : 29. "God gave Solomon largeness of heart." Largeness of heart is the great primary gift in which all other moral and spiritual gifts become possible. Littleness of heart makes all big things impossible. The little heart has no capacity for noble entertainment. Only petty things can get in. Indeed, meanness is an imperative condition of entrance. A large heart is precious, first of all, just because of its roominess. It has marvelous powers of expansion. It always has room for something more.

Think of some of the big things that dwell with easy naturalness in the large heart. There is a roomy communion with God. The prayers have a rich and inclusive fulness. The spiritual expectations are of a wealthy order. The praises go forth like well-laden argosies carrying exports from a rich and bountiful land. The joys are big, quiet satisfactions, and not small merriments that empty themselves in an hour. And, with all these, the large heart has a roomy receptiveness. When God comes to it he finds abundant room wherein to bestow his goods. In such lives the good Lord always finds room in the inn. And while the large heart sustains a roomy fellowship with God it also cultivates a roomy fellowship with man. It is magnanimous in all its judgments. Its sympathies are like brimming springs, and they flow freely on every side. It is given to hospitality. It has the twin graces of the open house and the open hand.

Now here is a strange discovery of experience. A large heart cannot entertain a small thought or a mean mood. Littleness cannot breathe in an atmosphere of largeness. A large mind is immune from small invasions. And therefore our first and finest security against the petty enemies which carry such a deadly poison is to grow a bigger soul.

"No man, by being anxious, can add a cubit unto his stature." But in the realm of the spirit we can, by reasonable thought and consecration, put ourselves into such relationship to the Lord that we can surely obtain spiritual enlargement. The enlargement may not come to us solely through the ministry of supplication. It may come by our supplications cooperating with God in the control of apparently unfriendly circumstances. Our present lot may seem very unfavorable to spiritual growth, and yet the very antagonism may be the appointed minister of our enlargement. "In my distress thou hast enlarged me!" That is the divine paradox. We are shut up in straits, and we come out bigger men! Perhaps we entered our imprisonment as pilgrims who were only endowed with feet; we came out as birds of God, equipped with wings! But however the enlargement may come to us, and whatever be the manner of our circumstances, our growth is absolutely sure if we reverently relate ourselves to our God in faith and prayer, through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord.

"The Day of Jesus Christ"

MONDAY, June 17. Phil. 1 : 6. "He which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ." What day is this to which these words refer? The day of Christ's second coming? Doubtless. The day we have been taught to look toward with longing, but not to set a date for. That will be the day of our Saviour's crowning, the day of his vindication. But there is another day of Jesus Christ, the day of his coming to us at the end of our lives, "when the shadows lengthen, and the busy world is hushed, and the fever of life is over, and our work is done." That day will mark the completion of his work in us, begun that first eventful day when he spoke peace to our souls, and repeated daily since. What a new view this gives us of death! Death is the coming to us of our Uttermost Friend. It is this view which changes our whole attitude to advancing years, to increasing feebleness, to old age, and to the day from which we naturally shrink with deep dislike if not with terror. This view gives us to see in death our Lord's black slave, sent to disrobe us of our flesh, and to prepare us for the audience chamber of the King. What if he shall disrobe us of these bodies? We shall not be unclothed, for all the while we have been "clothed upon with immortality."

Then there is still another day which belongs peculiarly to Jesus Christ. It is the Day of Resurrection. Then shall we know the deep meaning of those mystic words, "the redemption of the body." Then shall be brought to pass the saying, "Death is swallowed up in victory." Not long ago a distinguished military critic said, speaking of our enemies in the present war, "They are defeated already, but they do not know it yet." This is true of death. Death still has power, but long ago our Commander limited that power, and even now death is captive to the King of kings and Lord of lords. But there is yet to come a day of Jesus Christ which shall dawn without a cloud, the day for which all other days were made. There is a line in a comparatively unknown stanza of Julia Ward Howe's Battle Hymn which reads:

And the earth shall be his footstool, and the soul of time his slave.

We have spoken of death as the slave of Christ. The poet speaks of time as another of the servants of our King. The fact is, all days belong to him who was and is and is to come.

Advantages of Adversity

TUESDAY, June 18. Ps. 31 : 2. "Be thou my strong rock, for an house of defence to save me." Elsewhere David prays God to be "his strong habitation, whereunto he may continually resort." During days of persecution which a righteous person must suffer, a feeling of great loneliness, of utter forsakenness, comes over him. He finds himself outlawed by men. The world has done with him; it wants no more of him. His enemies have long ago shut him out from their dwellings. His friends shun him and make him feel that his company is not desired. He is become a homeless wretch. Not that he has been actually driven out of his habitation and become an exile from his home-land; but the hostile attitude of his fellow men has deprived him of the enjoyment of his home. He wishes that he might be given wings of a dove, to fly away and be at rest.

Distresses of this kind can have only one effect on believers: they urge them to seek a closer contact with God. As men move away from them, they move up to God, and a sense of safety steals into their weary heart at the thought that God is round about them like a walled city, against which the enemies may storm and rage, but which they will never scale or break through. In peaceful times a fortress is not considered a desirable place to live in: but in times of war it seems a most desirable place. God must at times send us great hardships, to reveal to us the insecurity of our position in a world that hates him, and to lead us to a more lively appreciation of his mighty protection.

Days of ease beget security, and security has a soporific effect on the spirit of faith and devotion. Prayers become listless and lukewarm performances at such times. To disturb this fatal sense of ease and safety God often sends adversity. Trouble has a rousing effect; it is the rallying call to the new man in us, to put on the strength of the Lord. The best prayers that the heart has offered to God have been wrung from it in days of distress.

False Gods

WEDNESDAY, June 19. Ex. 20 : 3. "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." All mankind dwells either on the low plains of materialism or on the higher plateau of the spiritual. The one living and true God is worshiped and obeyed by all who live the ideal spiritual life. The multitude which has no higher aim than ease and success in this present time creates gods of its own liking. God in Christ with his Ten Commandments is too exacting for many in business life and amid the lustful pleasures and propensities of the natural man.

One builds a little toy god out of culture. He looks like a king on the chessboard of the game of life. Another, out of fashion, makes a pretty queen god. Millions follow in her train, but soon she vanishes like a rainbow. Then there are knights of chivalry, fighting for their own castles, human gods, who fall like Dagon at the first touch of the finger of death. There are a multitude of little Billikin pawns, of social custom and selfish service, second-hand gods, made of left-over materials, from the scrap-heaps of blurred brains, black hearts and visionary conceptions.

Every family in heathen or civilized countries which rejects the God of the universe has gods of its own manufacture, as a substitute for the Infinite. Oh that men would serve and worship the Creator rather than the creature! Then they would rise evermore "nearer, my God, to thee," instead of following a forlorn hope into the den of Giant Despair, where passions revel and hate burns.

THURSDAY, June 20. James 1 : 27. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." The divine origin of Christianity is well authenticated by its demand upon us for purity of heart. It is the only thing that does demand it. Society does not; fashion does not; learned societies do not. The world looks on the outward appearance, but God sees beneath the surface, beneath the beauty which is only skin-deep, beneath the silken veil, the ermine robe. God knocks at the door of every chamber of reflection and desire, inquiring, "Is thy heart right?"

If people were only half as scrupulous about clean hearts as they are about clean linen! In some respects the world is very like a scullery. He must have thought so who wrote that verse in one of our Psalms: "Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold." There are ways of keeping one's self unspotted from the world. Certain birds are provided with tiny oil-glands in the skin which keep their feathers covered with an invisible oil. Dirt will not stick to them. They have an invisible armor. Certain insects dwell in the mud at the bottom of roadside pools, yet remain as bright as burnished brass. They are provided with suction glands which interpose a stratum of dry air between them and the world about them. Christianity offers us the means by which we may preserve our souls intact. We may keep ourselves unspotted from the world. The right spiritual attitude, the act of surrender daily renewed, the exercise of prayer, or rather of prayerfulness, and the atmosphere which attends the presence of the Holy Spirit, are the pledge and guarantee of unspotted purity.

Remembering the Truth

FRIDAY, June 21. 1 Cor. 15 : 1, 2. "I declare unto you the Gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand; by which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you." The preacher who addresses believers has a right to appeal to the knowledge and convictions which his hearers already have received from previous messages delivered to them. The illuminating power of the word of God enters the heart of men to stay, and the believer must use that light whenever he is in doubt and perplexed, as on a dark night he uses a flashlight that he carries with him. The faculty of the mind that is to do the flashing for him is his own memory. When a person becomes a Christian he consecrates also his memory to God. He stores faithfully in his mind all the instruction, admonition, and comfort that he receives at any time from his hearing or reading the Word.

The lessons drawn from the Word have an immediate use the moment they are received, but they are so rich that their full applicableness rarely appears in a single instance. On some future occasion the light which they have once given may be needed again. It may not be exactly the same occasion; there may be a slight difference in the attending circumstances, but the old truth will be found to apply to the new situation. It is therefore of the utmost importance that Christians cultivate a keen and faithful memory for the truths, principles, striking sayings, comforting texts of the Bible. We remember those things most easily with which we have made ourselves very familiar by constant use, and which we like most. If the Bible is our daily companion we shall readily understand even a remote and faint reference to anything it has said.

SATURDAY, June 22. Mark 9 : 5. "Master, it is good for us to be here; let us make three tabernacles." The joy of the Lord is our strength for service, not for selfish happiness. Visions of the glory of God is the need of every soul, that the light divine may be flashed from mountain summits through all the valleys of life. For thirty years afterward, Peter was ever revealing the wonderful Transfiguration scene. No doubt he rejoiced that he was not permitted to build the three tabernacles to keep Christ and the heavenly visitors on the Mount for the spiritual delight of the apostles. Peter soon saw that the Mount Hermon brightness was to shine in service and sacrifice for mankind on Mount Calvary.

The Delectable Mountain range is near the end of life's toilsome journey, from which Bunyan's pilgrim could view with glorious hope the mountains round about the New Jerusalem. It is not tabernacles for spiritual pleasure, erected on the summits of this present time, but mansions of heavenly glory which the soul desires when the home eternal swings into view. On the plains of Paradise we can well exclaim, "It is good to be here," where labor is rest and toil is pleasure beyond the confines of sin, sorrow, struggle and trial.

Indian Summer

By THOMAS
GRANT SPRINGER

MOTHER GROGAN sat with toiled hands folded idly in her broad lap. Her eyes were dim, not so much with the weariness of age as with retrospection; for it was a late afternoon in Indian summer, one of those days when the Old Year seems to lie back and dream of its youth, and its mood had laid soft hands on Mother Grogan. Through the sun-silvered autumn haze of memory she was wandering barefoot toward home over her native peat bogs, the soil of the "owld sod" once more under the springing feet of youth. The dingy walls of the tiny restaurant faded into wide vistas. The hot, stale smell of boiled beef, cabbage and onions, the heavy-odored food from which labor draws its strength seemed blown away by the breath of a clean wind. The rumble of the drays and the whirl of electric cars on the sordid avenue fell dumbly upon ears that were soothed by the murmurous quiet of the open country. Again the maiden Evening, clothed in silver mist with one bright star upon her virgin breast, and crowned as with a diadem by the crescent moon, crept soft-footed from the east across the bog. From the rough, shaggy-thatched stone hut a thin spiral of smoke rose like a sacrificial offering from a rude shrine. And Mother Grogan was Maggie Mooney once more, with the Celtic heartache of beauty like an exquisite pain in her breast, crooning a plaintive "comallye" for the very joy that made her voice break.

THE dusty screen door banged and a man shuffled in. The heavy feet of reality clumsily trampled the delicate fabric of a dream. As if to further shame her folly, her rheumatic joints had stiffened in idleness, so that she rose heavily. The poor have no right to try to cultivate roses on the rubbish heap of their existence; cabbages are more useful and hardy plants. Gray is the color of age, and when Indian summer touches it with gold it is but a mocking alchemy.

Mother Grogan ambled grotesquely to the front table, where the customer sat huddled in a heap, and began wiping off the soiled oilcloth with a rag which by its appearance did not promise much improvement. Her heart had ceased to sing, and she droned out the menu, not in a plaintive "comallye," but with the monotony of habit: "Corn beef an' cabbage, biled beef, steak an' onions."

"Steak," said the early diner in a voice the rich brogue of which was an echo to her reverie. Mother Grogan looked at him sharply. He was a stranger to her, that is, if she could consider any man with the brogue of her country a stranger. He was a little man; his skin was wrinkled from exposure like a shriveled apple left too long upon the tree. The creases of his neck were filled with coal dust, and she noticed that he had a whip leaning against his chair.

"Do ye be workin' about here, I dunno?" she asked, careless of service, for the supper rush was still an hour off.

"Not me," he replied. "I'm doin' a bit av haulin' be contract from th' bunkers be the ferry b' th' rayfinery forinst th' corner there. Phwy do ye ask?"

"Fer nothin' at all but me own diversion," she replied, and shuffled off into the kitchen. But there had been a purpose to her question. From his reply she was sure that he was, as she at first suspected, a Kerry man.

KERRY! How Indian summer fell away to the spring of youth at that name! The steaming fat with its burden of onions stung her eyes as she fried the steak, but the tears that flooded them were from the pungent smoke of the peat. She finished the cooking hastily and hurried back. The old man eyed the scorched meat with evident disfavor, but it was lost on Mother Grogan as he raised his face to hers to protest.

"Ye're a Kerry man, be ye not?" she asked, and the wrinkles of his puckered frown ran into a quick smile.

"Sure an' I am that same," he answered, with a proud attempt to square his bent shoulders that would have been humorous to any but Irish eyes.

"I took heed o' that whin I heard yer brogue," said Mother Grogan, taking the seat opposite him. "Sure an' I was sittin' here dramin' o' th' owld place whin ye come in. 'Tis like th' blessed saints knew me mind an' sint some one from there t' talk wid me."

"Faith, mum, 'tis strange enough I dropped in. 'Tis early fer me supper, but 'tis a long ride home, wid th' nag t' see whin I git there, an' 'twas one o' th' byes at th' rayfinery told me I'd be gettin' me money's worth here. Sure an' he was right," he lied, attacking the burnt steak in proof, for far be it from him to disparage anything of a Kerry woman's.

Mother Grogan's red face grew even redder. When age takes on weight and floridness a blush becomes a flush, for the colors of Indian summer are not as fresh as those of spring.

"An' phwat part o' Kerry be ye from?" she asked, almost unnecessarily; for surely only the men of her own district had such a sure knack at compliment.

"Up Traylee way," he answered. "An' you?"

She could hardly trust her voice to speak, so she nodded vigorously, then swallowed the sudden lump that rose in her throat, for he had mentioned her old home.

"An' phwat might yer name be?" she pursued in a trembling voice.

"Terry Murphy."

"Terry!" It was a cry from the heart of youth. He laid down his knife and fork and stared across at her. "Terry, Terry bye, don't ye know me? Sure 'tis Maggie, Maggie Mooney!"

THE russet hand of Indian summer rolled back the curtain of the years. Again they faced each other on the blossom-starred carpet of spring.

"Maggie!" he repeated hoarsely, his voice rasping in a choke that in a boy's would have been a sob.

"Warra, warra!" she crooned, "ah, th' long, long time!"

"Sure 'tis forty years an' more," he said huskily.

For a moment they sat silent, waiting for the keen edge of sudden memory to dull.

"An' so ye came t' America," she said slowly.

"Not till long after," he replied. "After I wint back an' found ye'd took Grogan."

"'Twas a long time ye took in comin'."

"Aye, fer me heart was sore."

"An' mine?" she queried.

"Sure ye took Grogan," he defended himself.

"Wid me father dead an' you gone in foolish anger two years! Phwat was a gurl t' do?"

He sat slowly nodding his head. "I was a fool, mavournen, an' I paid dear fer me folly. An' Grogan?"

"Gone these tin years, God rest his soul. He was a good man, Terry, an' kind t' me, kinder nor you was, but it could niver be th' same, an' he knew it."

"An' he left ye naither chick ner child?"

"Niver one, though if he had it'd o' been aisier."

TERRY leaned across the table and took the gnarled hands in his rough ones. "Maggie, acushla," he said huskily, "I've naither chick nor child myself, fer there niver was a colleen but you. I've saved a bit o' money, an' th' cart an' horse is mine. They tell me 'tis a fine green country hereabouts, as green as Ireland, but I've niver been much out o' N'Yark. It ain't too late yet, Maggie. Sure th' evenin' is a pleasant time t' sit at the door o' yer cot an' watch th' sun sink in a warm sky."

Even though his voice was cracked, to her it had the love-break of a boy's, the boy who had awakened her virgin heart. It would be sweet to watch the sunset with the man who had showed her the dawn. Surely the clouds of midday would then drift off into a calm night.

Her one waiter, a rough Irish boy, came in pulling off his coat. She rose quickly with a cackling laugh, but to Terry's ears it was the ripple of silver.

"Sure, lad, an' ye made me forgit th' supper hour."

"I'll bide here till it passes, thin. There's feed enough for th' nag, and I'll buy me a paper an' sit in th' corner," he said as she gathered up the dishes.

IN the steam and smoke of her stuffy kitchen Mother Grogan crooned at her work. The boys came crowding in; rough, dirty fellows from the mills, the factories and the refinery. They joked coarsely, swore loudly, and bawled their orders through the kitchen door to Mother Grogan; but they were her boys; for years she had fed them and grown to love them with all the generous maternity of a childless Irish heart.

Many of them she had seen leave her to go to homes of their own; even now some of their children thronged the sidewalk. Many she had carried over the week of the pay-day drunk. Some she had fed when the prospects of another pay-day seemed hopeless. A few she had seen laid away in humble graves with no one to follow but herself. They were all her boys, and to every one of them she was Mother Grogan.

Old Pete came hobbling in with his crutches. He had come back to her first after his accident. There was Old Louie, his crony, who had sat many a day at her kitchen door before he and Pete had gone into their little business. There was this one, there was that one, each she knew by name and fame and fortune. Terry, his paper lying idly on his knee, listened with pride to the ring of every voice that spoke to her—his Maggie.

A boy came in, shaking the moisture from his cap.

"Do it be rainin' now?" asked Mother Grogan in surprise.

"Sure, you can't trust this Indian summer." And the lad took his seat.

Mother Grogan turned to the kitchen window, against which the fingers of winter's skirmishers, the rain, were tapping. The boy was right; you could not trust Indian summer; its smile too soon melted into tears, its warmth into a chill. The tears rose to her eyes, the chill crept into her heart. Love had come only to mock her with old age.

SHE kept to her kitchen till the last of the boys had gone. As the waiter put on his coat, glancing curiously at Terry lounging in the corner, Mother Grogan came to the kitchen door, wiping her hands on her apron.

"Good night, mother," called the boy, turning up his coat collar and stepping out into the rain.

She looked after him, then crossed slowly to the corner, a new light in her eyes.

"Ye heard what he called me, Terry, ye heard what they all call me? 'Tis somethin' I ought t' been called fer sure long ago. 'Tis too late now, so I must kape phwat I have. 'Twas jest th' glow o' Indian summer fer a little while, but 'tis rainin' now, and th' winter do be here."

He choked and tried to speak. "Nay, lad," she went on; "we'll kape our little fire o' friendship wid th' twigs memory's gathered fer us, but a home hearth must have th' ashes o' years t' bank its warmth ag'in' th' winter."

And so she sent him out, riding alone into the tearful darkness, and some of the boys, passing, wondered why Mother Grogan's light burnt so late that night.

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. 1 Thes. 5:16-24

GOOD times are necessary to proper development of normal human beings. At certain ages, both boys and girls are happiest when they are noisiest; at certain other ages, only intense activity, races, contests, tests of endurance or of skill will meet their cravings. These desires for action and testing are often perverted so that the individual goes out for that kind of a "good time" which is described as "the night before the morning after." Such a good time usually implies surrender to temptations. The "good time" becomes a physical debauch, in which all that is best in the man is trodden under foot, and the morning after is, therefore, a time of repentance, often of despair. It is not necessary to break any law, moral, physical or political in order to have a good time. The best time is that which observes all these laws. Christianity is a happy faith, and Christians should be the happiest of earth's citizens. Life for the Christian should be one continual good time. There may be occasional clouds in the sky, but faith never fails to see the silver lining. There may be difficulties, but Christian assurance never doubts their overcoming. Christian faith, however, does not take out of young hearts the need for action, the desire for pleasure for itself. A Young People's Society which fulfills its whole mission must, therefore, plan wisely for many good times. Field meets, excursions, picnics, outdoor games, canoe trips, all may be used by a wide-awake Young People's Society as means for the development of deeper Christian grace. It is only necessary to remember the injunction of the Apostle in the quotation given in the text of this topic: "That with rejoicing we are to couple prayer without ceasing, and that we are to prove all things; to hold fast that which is good, and to abstain from all appearance of evil."

THIS topic was treated in last week's Christian Herald on page 714 as the Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. topic.

Christian Endeavor's Service Flag

THE officers of the United Society of Christian Endeavor have made a careful canvass in many parts of the country, to find out the average number of Christian Endeavorers in each society who have enlisted in their country's service. It has been found that on the average more than five to a society have already enlisted, and a service flag containing one star for each thousand Endeavorers in the service, with the figures, "140,000" in the center, was unfurled by the United Society, at a great meeting in Tremont Temple in Boston, where hundreds were turned away who could not gain admittance. If the Endeavorers in Canada, Australia, Great Britain and the other allied countries had been reckoned in, fully twice that number would appear upon the service flag of the World's Christian Endeavor Union, as even a larger proportion have gone from the countries which have been longer in the war. In some regiments it has been found that nearly one-tenth of the boys have belonged to such societies, and many temporary societies have been formed in the various cantonments. These societies work hand in hand with the Y. M. C. A. secretaries, most of whom have been Christian Endeavorers in days past, and the societies are welcomed as a distinct and important religious influence, by the Y. M. C. A.

Billy Sunday's Chicago Campaign

By RALPH M. MORPHETT

WITH three services on Sunday, May 19, which in the aggregate were attended by 40,000 persons, Evangelist Sunday's campaign in Chicago came to a close. During the ten weeks of meetings, the evangelist preached in the spacious Tabernacle no less than 133 sermons, and delivered in different parts of the city and on a variety of occasions, over fifty addresses, these being in the main of a patriotic nature. It is estimated that over one million persons attended the services at the Tabernacle. This means that no man has ever preached to so many people in Chicago at any one time as has Mr. Sunday, and it can be truly said that no one has done so more faithfully and fearlessly.

Just prior to the close, I asked Mr. Sunday how far his hopes had been realized.

"I think," he replied, "taking into account the extraordinary conditions brought about by the war—and especially the tremendous interest excited over the raising of the third Liberty Loan—I feel that Chicago has done its utmost for me. The members of the Executive Committee and pastors of the over four hundred cooperating churches rallied round us in a truly remarkable manner. Their loyal support and readiness to aid in every possible way, was a constant source of inspiration."

"I have been painfully conscious, in each of my recent campaigns, of the marked absence of young men from the meetings, and this was particularly noticeable in Chicago. Of course, I realize that war conditions furnish the explanation.

"I CANNOT refrain from paying a warm tribute to the kindness manifested by the superintendent and officials of the public schools, who unhesitatingly gave us unlimited opportunities to speak to the scholars, and though I did not preach, but addressed them on matters distinctly patriotic, the religious spirit was by no means lacking. And this leads me to state, that the work among High School students and those of the higher grades at the Tabernacle, and the special meetings arranged for them at the nearby churches, has certainly been more successful than in any other city. Yes, and I am profoundly grateful for the splendid cooperation of the large employers of labor and heads of the great department stores. Rarely a week evening passed without my hearing of a long list of business establishments being represented in the audience by their workers, in numbers often running into the thousands. I shall never forget the sympathetic spirit shown to me by the officials of the Northwestern Railway Company, who, I was told, prepared one of their large sheds to enable me to address as many of their employees as possible. So I feel quite proud of dear old Chicago and its people for these and many other tokens of their good-will."

"I have often felt tired—yes, very tired at times," he added "but not tired of the work. God knows, I never enjoyed preaching the Gospel more than during these past ten weeks. I am more than ever convinced that men and women are hungry to hear more about Jesus. Yes, what this sin-stricken world needs is the 'old, old story' preached as it was in the days of the great revivalists of the past and as, God helping me, I hope to preach it until the end."

Mr. Sunday stated that it had been his hope at the close of the six-week Duluth campaign to visit the soldiers in France; but a recent governmental order has made this impossible, and so he may spend some time in the training camps in this country, commencing his fall work at Providence, R. I., early in September.

AT the closing service he was presented with a check for $56,000 which was subsequently increased to nearly $60,000. This was Chicago's personal thank-offering, but, in accordance with his promise, he at once handed it all over to the trustees of the Pacific Garden Mission, to be added to a fund for the consolidation of the work.

Dr. James Ladd Thomas, chairman of the Sunday Campaign Committee, presented to Mr. Sunday a series of resolutions in which the results of the campaign so far as they could be tabulated were summarized. It was stated that "thousands had taken their first step towards repenting of their sins and confessing Christ" while even greater numbers had renewed their devotion in definite acts of rededication. 49,165 "hit the trail," and of this total approximately 35,000 signed cards.

AS the service within the church ended, the scene outside became gayer. Circles were formed in the midst of which there was dancing. The largest circle formed to watch two giant Khevsurs in chain armor fight a duel with swords. The glitter and flash from the long blades and the click and clatter of the small shields added to the brightness of the scene. On one side, a group of attractive young schoolgirls were singing the folk songs of their race. Farther on, some young fellows, armed with tom-toms and flageolets, danced and shouted and laughed. Near the narrow gate, an old mountaineer, reminiscent of the Scotch highlands, puffed his red cheeks and pumped his brawny arms over the irregular bulge of a bagpipe. There, in that grim old church courtyard, a picturesque people celebrated their freedom from the Russian Church in a thoroughly Georgian way. Freedom is their great desire, and freedom they will have. The Mtskheta festival marks their religious autonomy, and their political autonomy is only a question of time.

The Georgians have always had a large measure of self-government. They have a pride of race and love of national freedom which the stolid Russian peasant has never known. They are fighters to their finger-tips. For years they were forced to undergo oppression by a strong Russian government, and that government is no more. Shall they declare themselves independent? That would leave them a tiny island in a Pan-Islamic sea, buffeted by every tempest of religious or national hate.

But if Georgia, with its national aspirations, could be given local autonomy, while retaining an honored position in a great Russian democracy, Georgia might point the way to a strong government for Russia itself. The centripetal force of autocracy in Russia has been dissipated. The centripetal force of national pride and unity has not yet developed. One ministry after another has tried to bring Russia to its senses. But the provincialism which autocracy forged, democracy cannot break, and the unwieldy mass of peoples is stumbling blindly in its search for freedom and nationality.

THE Great Russian has not been able to feel the inspiration of a united republic. The soldier near Riga, while retreating, says, "Never mind, I live in Astrakhan," and the deserter from the southwestern front comforts himself with the thought, "It is a long way for the Germans to go before they reach my village." The Russian lacks the ability or desire to fight for his fellow Russians. He conceives of no danger until his own town, field or home is endangered. But the Georgian is not that type. Neither is the Cossack, that sturdy frontiersman who has defended the southern boundaries of his land for centuries. Farther north, in the Ukraine, there are nationalist tendencies. These nationalist tendencies among Armenians, Georgians, North Caucasus Cossacks, Don Cossacks and Ukrainians may work to disrupt the Russian state. But if each of these peoples can be given the limit of local autonomy at the same time that they yield organized loyalty to the central state, Russia may be saved from the difficulties that beset her. In her warrior tribes Russia may find defeat or strength.

Part of ancient Georgia has long been in Turkish hands, and if the Georgians could feel that they would reap the benefits of their labors, they might fight the hated Turk to a standstill and disgraceful retreat. With the back of Turkey broken, England's forces in Egypt and Mesopotamia could be sent to the German front, the Pan-German dream of a land route to the East dispelled, and the Slavic peoples of the Balkans convinced of the futility of Germany's dream. Constantinople itself, all claim to which has been repudiated in Petrograd, might be taken by forces whose center is Tiflis. Russia, lacking in nationalism, might learn her lesson in the sturdy nationalism of those Caucasians who have never given up their age-long dream of freedom.

Among the Workers

New York, said the change had been made to make the observance uniform throughout the United States. The Atlantic coast had been holding Sailor Day a fortnight after Easter, while the Pacific coast had suggested a day in early spring or late autumn. San Francisco favored the later observance because seamen from the Pacific coast go to Alaskan waters from April until October. In the West it was a question of having an adequate attendance. The proposed change was submitted to the seamen's societies, which left the decision to the Joint Conference for the Port of New York.

National War Savings Day June 28th

That's the day we sign up.

That's the day we tell Uncle Sam just how hard we want to win this war. That's the day our government has officially set for us to purchase War Savings Stamps.

On June 28th every man, woman and child in the United States will be called upon to pledge his or her full quota of War Savings Stamp purchases for 1918.

You will be expected to pledge the full amount that you can afford—no more—but by the same token, no less.

In every state, county, city, town and village the War Savings Committees are preparing for this big patriotic rally of June 28th. Unless you have already bought War Savings Stamps to the $1,000 limit, get busy with paper and pencil and figure out the utmost you can do.

Remember this. You take no chances when you go the limit on War Savings Stamps. They are the best and safest investment in the world. They pay you 4% interest compounded quarterly. They can't go below par. You can get back every dollar you put into War Savings Stamps any time you need it. You can turn them in at the Post Office any time for their full value plus interest.

Uncle Sam is asking hundreds of thousands of men to give their lives to their country. He is asking you only to lend your money.

What are you lending?

Marion Harland's Corner

Cornerites Respond to Perplexed Querists

A NEW YORK member leads off today in reply to the question relative to possible use for the parings tossed by the wasteful into the garbage pail:

Potatoes have more food value if cooked in their jackets. You have then only the very thin skin to dispose of. I find that carrots also are good if cooked before they are pared. I have heard, too, that the parings of turnips and onions may be utilized by washing them thoroughly, then cooking them in a bag of coarse cheese cloth or mosquito netting long and slowly. When they are very soft, press the "fleshy" part through the bag and season as thickening for family broths or stews.—H. C. H., New York.

A city deaconess, who has had long experience in charity work, has her comment upon the garbage pail:

Coffee grounds are the only things not saved. Carrots and turnips may be boiled unpared, or the parings may be used for soup, or mashed into a palatable dish. Potato soup from parings I never tried personally, but several of my tenement women tell me it is good, as is the broth from pea-pods. I, too, have seen practically whole loaves in the garbage pails of the poor. Dandelion salad, country women have told me, is an excellent, old-fashioned dish.—M. S., New Jersey.

As the season for dandelions is with us, I slip in here a recipe for making the salad commended by your informants. It is a welcome addition to dinner on a hot day and very wholesome:

Dandelion Salad

The best time to gather them is in the morning before the dew is off. Pick the young, tender leaves, wash and lay them in very cold water for an hour or so, changing for fresh should you leave them longer. Drain and pat, to make them quite dry, in a folded napkin. Heap the leaves in a chilled bowl and send at once to table. Pass a small pitcher of French dressing with the salad.

French country people have known the value of dandelions for centuries. This, which most Americans reckon as a weed, is also excellent food when cooked and served as a vegetable:

Stewed Dandelions

Pick the leaves from the stems and drop into very cold water. When they are freed from sand and dust, lift them, dripping wet, from the water and put, without draining, into the inner vessel of a double boiler. Do not add any water except that which clings to the wet leaves. Cover the inner saucepan and set in a pot of boiling water. Cook fast for half an hour. Rub them through a colander into a saucepan; stir in a heaping teaspoonful of lemon juice and (if you have it) two tablespoonfuls of cream or "the top of the milk," to which has been added just a wee pinch of soda. Beat smooth over the fire until again very hot, and serve.

The homely vegetable, thus prepared, is as palatable as spinach à la crème, and in the country may be had for the picking.

Returning to the batch of answers to the query which wound up our talk upon an unsavory subject, we read:

I run parings of all kinds (apples excepted) through the food chopper and give to my chickens as part of their daily food. They make quick work of clearing it away. No garbage can at our house! For not a crust or a crumb of anything is thrown away.—Mrs. P. W. B., Pennsylvania.

That Connecticut keeps up her ancient reputation for frugality we are assured by the next letter—from one who knows whereof she speaks:

I was brought up by a frugal mother. She taught me habits of thrift which she practiced. I do not believe she ever had a garbage pail—nor have I! What do I do with skins? Burn them! If one does not want to put them into the stove while wet, have a disused pan (iron preferred), drop them into it, and put them into the oven until dry, and a fire will make ashes of them in no time.

I am amazed that people can be so wasteful of good food! I always throw even very small crumbs to the birds, and one little bird comes for them whenever he sees me throw them out with a little "Thank you!"—C. E. W. S., Connecticut.

Another esteemed Cornerite advises the cremation of "garbage"—that is, whatever housewifely intelligence has condemned as absolutely worthless. She, too, dries the refuse between papers in the oven before burning it. I am sorry that we have not room for her letter in full. It is but fair to remark that in many cities this method of disposing of rubbish is positively prohibited on account of the odor arising from the burning stuff.

Similar objections will be urged against the plan indicated by the following:

The city garden plot affords a corner where refuse vegetables are dumped, covered with soil, and allowed to decay and form a sort of compost; or they burn well when dry and added to coal and wood in stove or heater.—CORDIAL CORNERITE, Wisconsin.

FROM a valuable letter too long for insertion as a whole, in a single issue, I extract gratefully what may meet the views of a correspondent (Young Housekeeper, Vermont) who wants "something out of the ordinary run of war-time recipes, yet something that will teach us a way of setting a decent table without sending an order to the butcher that will swell bills—and our hearts!

I am but too glad to leave so able a contributor to attempt the task:

I have found a good way to use all leftover pieces of "substitute" breads, cold biscuits, vegetables of all kinds and dry bread. Break in small pieces; add all other left-overs, moisten with hot water, season with sage, salt and pepper and raw onion, cut and sliced very thin. Mix well. Put several thin pieces of beef suet into a bake pan. Pour in the well-mixed mass and bake (covered) slowly for an hour or more according to the quantity. This makes a very "hearty," savory dish. Or so my family think. The school-boy never tires of it for supper.

Carrots are very sweet and nice at this time of the year if baked. Scrape, and slice and cover with water. Add a pinch of soda, a few thin bits of beef suet; salt and pepper, added after baking 'till nearly done. Salt is hardening if added at first I think. Still, as these are not mashed, but left whole, it does not matter. Brown, by letting water all drain out, and leaving in hot oven until brown—if liked better so. I bake a good many and use some with milk as a soup, creaming them.—Mrs. E. M. H., Wisconsin.

Two more friendly notes upon the question that has excited far more interest than I had anticipated embody practical and well-put suggestions as to methods of clearing the house of useless "left-overs":

Parings of potatoes and other vegetables are cooked for fowls. Enough dry meal is added to absorb moisture. It lessens the grain-bill and helps provide eggs for the family.

People are encouraged in our town to join "The Hen Clubs" and backyards are not injured by a "run" for a few well cared-for hens.

Then, it does away with the garbage-pail except for banana skins and coffee-grounds, which may be buried deep for fertilizers if there is room for a bit of garden.—L. R. B., Connecticut.

Potato parings, if put into the coal-stove will clean the stove and pipe of soot. I have had my soft coal stove stand until it required new pipe; without cleaning, by burning the potato parings. Until I learned this I had to buy "Zinc" scraps every few weeks to clean the soft coal stove. I burn the parings in either the hard or soft coal stove. They are more needed, however, in soft coal stoves.—W. I. C., Iowa.

I have seen and heard a good deal lately of dry yeast. It is especially recommended for those who live in the country and as I'm planning to spend the summer on a farm seven miles from a railroad, I should like to know something about how to use it. What is the difference between this and compressed yeast? Will the dry yeast keep better? I wish I could get the experience of some housekeepers who have used it.—HARRIETTA H. E., Cranford, N. J.

Other dwellers in the country and in suburban towns have written to me on the same subject. In the city it is easy to get brewer's yeast which is perhaps the most potent on the market. Compressed yeast, in divers forms, may be had in any country store, and is in general use. Yeast cakes of several brands are almost as popular. Will housewives who have used what our New Jersey member calls "dry yeast," tell us in what form it comes and if it has any advantage over the various "makes" of portable yeast already in the market.

A SQUARE DEAL

It was a former president of the United States, if we mistake not, who popularized that now famous expression, a square deal.

What is a square deal?

It's a deal where you get your due and the other fellow gets his—a deal that's "on the level," that squares with fair play.

It's the one and only kind of deal you can make with CHRISTIAN HERALD advertisers. For CHRISTIAN HERALD is a third party to every transaction that takes place through its advertising columns and CHRISTIAN HERALD is a staunch believer in the square deal.

A Marcher

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IN a large parade this week there was a certain marcher—a woman who wore the white apron and flowing headdress of an official Red Cross worker. She walked steadily, did this marcher, with a smile on her singularly calm face—a smile that held, perhaps a hint of triumph. One had to look at her a second time before it became apparent that the little girl who walked beside her, holding her hand, was guiding her—that her too-steady eyes, fixed on nothing in particular, could not see the flickering sunlight that fell so warmly all about her, on the changing crowds that thronged the pavements.

The marcher was Miss Lottie Gerson. And Miss Gerson is blind. Her blindness, however, does not keep her from doing her bit to help her nation win a war. For she has risen above her affliction, bravely—more than bravely. She has risen above it with undiminished energy and enthusiasm.

A sweater knitted recently by Miss Gerson was declared the most perfect sweater handed in to the Red Cross. The bandages that she rolls are splendidly efficient bandages. She speaks for the Red Cross—marches for it—works for it. And in doing so she glorifies her country.

ABLIND woman, marching in the sun, with a smile on her face! It's an inspiring sight—the sort of a sight that would make any boy, going to fight his nation's battles, proud of the ideals that are back of that nation. And it's the idealism of America that's going to win this war! If Miss Gerson, instead of marching and knitting and helping in every possible way, had stayed at home—bemoaning her fate, wondering with bitterness why she had been denied the gift of sight—a number of soldier lads, perhaps an uncountable number, who will find hope and even life through the Red Cross, would have found, instead, bitterness and perhaps death. For the example that Miss Gerson, bravely and steadfastly doing her bit, was able to point, has helped a good many folk to think a bit more clearly, to give more willingly, and to work more untiringly for the great organization that she represents.

She's typical of America, is Miss Gerson—typical of a race of people who can march and smile and do good even at the cost of personal comfort (for it can't be very comfortable, if you're blind, to march in a great crowded parade of people who can see!).

A GIRL friend came to see me yesterday. The picture of Miss Gerson marching in the parade, was lying on my work table, and she picked it up, casually, to look at it.

"Who's the lady?" she asked quite carelessly.

"That," I told her, "is Miss Lottie Gerson. She's a Red Cross worker, and that's a picture of her, marching in their parade."

"Yes—" my friend was looking at the other pictures in the pile on my desk—"that's nice." Her tone was unenthusiastic.

"Miss Gerson," I told her, "knitted the most perfect sweater handed in to the Red Cross!"

"That's splendid," the girl friend said—also unenthusiastically. She laid the pictures back on my desk.

"You see," I said, "Miss Gerson is blind."

The girl friend picked up the picture again and scrutinized the calm face of the marcher.

"Why," she murmured at last, and her tone was subtly different, "why, so she is!"

I didn't say anything as the girl studied the little picture. But I noticed that there was a certain intensity about her gaze—a certain intensity that was veiled, perhaps, by a hint of tears.

"It's hard," she told me at last, breaking the silence, "it's hard, I reckon, for her to help the way she does—not seeing and all. But, just the same, she does help! It makes me feel downright mean!"

"Why does it make you feel mean?" I questioned.

"Because," my girl friend told me, "it's so much easier for me to do that sort of work than it is for her to do it. And yet she's done more than I have—much more—" She paused, and then went on again.

"I hadn't thought a great deal about it before," she told me, "but I'm thinking now! I'm going to do my bit. Compared to what she does I scarcely justify my existence."

IT'S easy to get my girl friend's point of view, because it's a point of view that every normal human being, looking at Miss Gerson's picture, is bound to share. It's the point of view that any healthy, worthwhile person can't help sharing when they see some one, weaker than they, who is brave enough to carry a cross uncomplainingly and at the same time, to help others carry their cross!

Oh, people who have sound eyes—people who are healthy and well—people who have kind hearts and a desire to help—look at Miss Gerson's picture and take from it the inspiration that I have taken. Say to yourselves, as my girl friend said, "It's harder—much harder—for her to help than it is for me to help!" And then put the words into practice.

For at this time help is needed everywhere. There are countless things that patriotic Americans can do, things that will be easier for them to do than it was for Miss Gerson to make the most perfect sweater and to march in a parade. It may be knitting, or speaking, or gardening—it may be putting courage into hearts and fearlessness into souls. But, no matter what your task is, do it! And if it seems hard, remember a certain marcher who walked without seeing.

REV. ALBERT E. STONE, until recently pastor of the First Baptist Church, Putnam, Conn., is an example of a plucky young minister who is anxious to serve his country. He sought appointment as a chaplain in the navy, and was found satisfactory in every way except in physical fitness, being under weight and lacking in full chest expansion. He came back to his alma mater, Mount Hermon School, Moody's famous school for boys at Northfield, and sought work chopping wood in the school forest. He worked for nearly two months during the rigorous winter until he was in condition to pass the physical test. He has received his commission and is now in service at the Newport Naval Training School, Newport, R. I.

SHE has the vision, though she may not see, The vision that has called past shot and shell, The vision that has lived through war's red hell And spurred men on to fight for liberty.

Her path may lie afar from war's alarms, And yet she, in her way, has done her part, By giving from an overflowing heart, By helpful hands, and tender woman-arms.

She cannot see the splendid sunset skies, She cannot see the flowers and the grass, Yet comes the feeling, when one sees her pass, That she has clearer sight than we, with eyes!

Wherever Water Leaks—"X" Liquid Makes a Scientific Repair!

IN less than 10 minutes "X" Liquid will permanently repair leaks anywhere in the radiator—or the pump, gaskets, connections, etc.

"X" is a scientific process of repairing leaks without solder or welding. It is poured into the radiator; circulates with the water; hardens right in every leak. Thousands of car owners always keep "X" Liquid in the water to prevent leaks.

The same "X" which repairs leaks loosens the Rust and Scale in the cooling system. And no new Rust or Scale can form while "X" is in the water. Thus the water passages are kept clean, cooling is improved, and oil saved.

"X" is not a cement, powder or flaxseed meal in liquid form. Can't clog the cooling system.

Cost of Having

Figure the hours which a corn may spoil—the best hours that you have.

Figure the hours spent in paring it—just to lessen the pain for a time.

Then remember that all is needless. It is folly, it is out of date. The day of corns ended years ago, when Blue-jay was invented.

Millions of people never know a corn ache. Nobody ever should. Those who do either coddle corns, or use some old-time treatment.

Cost of Ending

In time it takes a jiffy—just the moment needed to apply a little Blue-jay plaster. The money cost is about four cents.

The corn pain then stops instantly, never to come back. The corn itself disappears completely, and usually with one application.

There is no effort, no discomfort. You apply the Blue-jay and forget the corn. Try it tonight. What it does to one corn it will do to every corn that comes. As one goes, all will go, and as soon as they appear.

You may save a thousand hours, perhaps, by proving this fact now.

Jesus Triumphant Over Death

International Sunday School Lesson for June 23. Mark 16: 1-20

The Assurance of Immortality

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WHAT a contrast there is between that stricken, scattered, faithless band of disciples who forsook Jesus and fled from Gethsemane, and the group of sturdy witnesses to the rejected Messiah who went forth a few short weeks later to evangelize the world! How great the transformation of a little company of disillusioned enthusiasts weeping over a shattered dream into a glorious army of indomitable souls building on earth God's Kingdom as it is in heaven! What happened meanwhile to change them so? What intervening events worked this magic? Well do we know the cause: the glorious conviction that Christ had risen had seized upon their hearts. His cause was not lost but conquering and to conquer. He was not dead and defeated, but ever living and directing his great spiritual program personally. The cross had not been the end but the veritable beginning of world-wide redemption. It had become the sublimest emblem of the victory of good over evil, of the spirit over the flesh, that humanity has ever hailed and loved.

That First Glad Easter Day

The events of that Day of Resurrection are still hard to tabulate accurately—hence the various emphases made by different students and by the four Gospels themselves. That Christ rose is certain. That he manifested himself to his friends is sure. But what transitions of sorrow, hope, incredulous joy and glad new faith the disciples underwent is reflected plainly in the brief and sketchy sentences in our lesson in Mark today. It is only natural for us to wish for more details and exacter information than our evangelist gives us. By turning to the other accounts some supplementary description may be secured. For instance, Luke has that beautiful chapter concerning the walk to Emmaus, which has inspired and comforted thousands. Mark dismisses it with the barest sentence.

Here we see how reticent and free from any exaggerations the Gospel writers are. Imagine such stupendous incidents being stated so simply and quietly by heathen authors, if you can. Heathen lore fills columns with the supernatural exploits of its imaginary deities, but the Gospel makes no attempt to state to mortal minds how Jesus met and conquered the last enemy.

Significant Incidents in Mark's Account

Rather are we to find instruction and help in the incidental touches in our story than to match our strength against the elemental power of the resurrection itself. See the three women coming with tender consideration at the earliest possible moment with spices for the anointing which was love's last poor privilege toward the dead. Their fidelity and thoughtfulness were rewarded by the first glad tidings of the Risen One. God is so generous to us: we come to mourn the dead, he gives us the blessed news of eternal life. We think ourselves approaching the tomb where lie buried all our hopes, he greets us with an invitation to share in the making of a new era when those hopes shall blossom and bear fruit to the healing of the nations. We dread to see again the stone that has been rolled across the pathway of old friendships, we find that he himself has removed the mighty obstacles while we slept for sorrow. God is good to us.

And first of all, first among the three, was Mary Magdalene. The glorified Redeemer manifested himself, not to the world, but to a humble woman whose tender love had responded without measure to him who had saved her from worse than death.

Then the special mention of Peter in the angel's message: "Go, tell his disciples and Peter." The commentators tell us that it was because he was spokesman and leader of the apostolic band. But our hearts tell us with absolute assurance that it was because Peter's soul was in agony at the remembrance of that dark night of denial.

The Great Commission in Mark

According to Mark's account it seems that the eleven were very slow of heart to believe the good news. Any one who discounts the story of the resurrection as the invention of hysterical enthusiasts has got to explain the slow transition from doubt to certainty, the recurring "they disbelieved" of our chapter. These men were hard to convince. Finally they reached a rock-like faith. This was after Jesus commissioned them with the work of preaching a Gospel, going on with his plans, building up an organization. They seemed to become men of faith only when they realized that he had given them a mighty work to do. It is a lesson for some of us, who try to feel the pulse of our own souls and wonder if we are gaining spiritually. Religion is no such passive thing. When we catch a vision of what Jesus wants us to do, when the imperative of a great commission resounds through our hearts, then we too shall become men of faith. We shall not then hesitate and blunder about in anxious weakness. It is the men with a mission, like Paul, who are able to do all things through Christ.

That is the feeling which lies behind Mark's record of the promise of power. They were henceforth able to cast out demons, to speak with new tongues, to take up serpents and to drink deadly things and to heal the sick. Such varied manifestations were the tokens of revived faith in a transcendent Lord under the inspiration of being chosen and ordained to do his work after him.

Because He Lives We Shall Live Also

It is a great surprise to some to find how little Jesus taught in the Synoptic Gospels with regard to immortality. It was one of the cardinal truths that he took for granted. For example, he assumed the existence of God the Father and never wasted an argument to prove it. Just so he spoke of the future life. If God is a Father he will never willingly let his children utterly die. Since God loves us we must be capable of immortality. He is not the God of the dead but of the living. But apart from the sure undercurrent of confidence regarding this great issue, we can find little material for speculation. He was content, as we should be, to leave the how and the where to the Almighty One. Moreover, he found it necessary to spend all his energies in instructing and guiding men concerning our daily choices and duties which after all finally determine our future destiny.

But what a glorious light has streamed over death's dark mystery with the Resurrection of Jesus! It is the source of an assurance regarding the unseen future that the world had never known before. As Paul truly said, "Because he lives we shall live also." We can never believe for a moment that Jesus Christ ceased to be, went out into black nothingness. But he bound his destiny so tightly with that of his brethren that we share his superiority to the grave. We are certain that God could not leave him in the dust. But he would not accept for himself what he could not claim for others. When you really believe in Jesus you no longer fret about these things. We are his, and he is God's!

What are the practical consequences of the Resurrection? For the apostles, something to live for, a world to win, a faith which mocked the cross and flame, and afterward a share in the immortal friendship of him whom they had loved. Is it not so for us also? To know that the tomb is not a blind alley but a thoroughfare, that greater things await us beyond the veil, is not this the greatest incentive to nobility of life, to higher aspirations, to renewed consecration to the purposes of the Lord? We too have a world to win, a share in the coming Kingdom. Because he lives we shall live. Because we shall live, with God's help we shall live here and now the life that is life indeed.

Sunday School Methods

The International Sunday School Convention, Buffalo, June 19 to 26

ALREADY many states have filled their quota of delegates to this great quadrennial convention, which brings together the Sunday school leadership of North America. The place and the times bid fair to bring together a great company to consider the relation of the Sunday school to the country's present and future.

Some have questioned the wisdom of holding this convention in the midst of the war. As a conservation measure, however, it is absolutely essential to the building up of the morale and spiritual background of the nation. It is even more necessary for the devising of plans and the launching of a program that shall be adequate for both today and tomorrow.

The Sunday school must be kept strong for its tasks of today. One of these tasks is to keep in vital touch with the multitude of boys and young men who have gone out from our schools for service.

The Sunday school, too, must be in the thick of the fight on national prohibition. It is the temperance teaching in the Sunday school ten to twenty years ago that is responsible for the temperance victories of today. The Buffalo Convention will have a strong prohibition emphasis.

Then the Sunday school must be kept headed up in its war-time philanthropies. With nearly a million dollars contributed by the Sunday schools recently toward but one such need, the American and Syrian Relief, the potential power of the Sunday school as a giver can be appreciated. But beyond the immediate giving lies the great educational influence of these world appeals upon the childhood and youth of today that will be reflected in their world citizenship tomorrow.

Another great emphasis at Buffalo will be upon the Sunday school as the church school in relation to the public school. There is now a clear admission that the church school is as necessary as the public school; that to train the mind and not the soul would be disastrous for the individual, the home and the nation.

With this conviction has come the necessity for the shaping of plans for the religious training of the nation, so that, without sacrificing at all our spiritual objectives, we should so improve the organization, teaching and administration of the Sunday school that it shall stand up strong in comparison with the public school; that these shall be twin agencies in the making of the life.

In this great task it is recognized that the teacher's life and love and work, as well as the teacher's teaching, is at the very foundation of this work of life-making, and that this must remain the supreme power of the Sunday school. And the Sunday school of tomorrow will be planned with this in view. But it will also train this teaching leadership to highest efficiency in communicating truth; it will provide for the thorough supervision of the Sunday school by trained people, and will ask church educational institutions and colleges to train pastors and students as Sunday school leaders.

The Buffalo Convention, too, will stress America and World Evangelism. "Thy Kingdom Come" will be the theme. It will emphasize Moody's great words: "If we can win one generation, we have put the devil out of business," and Dr. F. B. Meyer's words, "If the world is ever to be saved it will be saved through its childhood." This is Kingdom strategy. It is the natural way. It is God's way of making a new world.

What Buffalo shall reveal in membership advance may be suggested in the Sunday school membership report of the Census Bureau. This was recently indicated in the Christian Herald. The Sunday school membership, Protestant, in the United States is a little over 20,000,000—a stupendous total and an advance over the figures published by the International Sunday School Association for the Chicago Convention of about four millions, a gain in the last four years of a million a year.

The great patriotic rally on the evening of June 25 will have as its speakers a distinguished Canadian, and Governor Whitman of New York, besides a high national representative whose name cannot be divulged at this writing.

At Buffalo a program will be launched as to education, evangelism and patriotism, worthy of the cause and meeting squarely the challenge of the new day.

prayed much in secret, but he prayed also publicly for the sake of the people that stood by. We who today seek to live in him and for him must be often in prayer. The secret prayer we may not stint, for therein lies our source of power. For public prayer we should be always ready, for therein lies one of our avenues of service. Christ's public prayers were simple, short, direct and devoid of all self-exploitation or aggrandizement. His prayers brought the people that stood by face to face with the Father and planted seeds of faith in hungry hearts. If we pray according to his pattern and in his spirit, we, too, may rend the veil of unbelief and bring the light of heaven into darkened souls. If we avoid public prayer we may not only lose opportunities for service, but we may find our closet empty of the presence which once blessed us there.

J. W. C. praises God for bodily healing of members of his family. He asks prayers for the healing of others, and joins in our united prayer for world peace.

Prayers are asked for revival of religion at:

Macon, Mo.; Grow, Okla.; Foss, Okla.; Yvalde, Texas (that many may be saved during revival); Croft, N. D. (that many may be saved during revival); Grand Saline, Texas (that many may be saved during revival); Portland, Ore. (for a church that has been organized for the uplift of the fallen); Pattonville, Mo. (at the Presbyterian Church).

Rev. G. T. asks prayer that a Presbyterian pastor may find a suitable field of service in Missouri; Miss M. T. D., Inavale, Neb. (that a minister may be sent and church built up); A Reader, that an evangelist who is hampered in working for the Lord through lack of means may be provided for; Mrs. T. C. H., McHenry, Md. (to receive the right amount to rebuild the Methodist Church).

Mrs. C. M. H. asks prayer that son's mind may be restored; Faithful Reader, that daughter's mind may be restored; four friends, for mental restoration.

F. H. B. asks prayer that wife's sight may be restored; Mrs. O. B. S., that brother's eyes may be cured of cataracts; Mrs. C. H. B. and R., that friends' sight may be restored; three friends, that their own sight may be restored.

Ten friends ask prayer for special blessings for others, including S. E. I., that our boys may be kept from evil during the war; L. E. A., that a widowed mother whose son has been killed in battle may be comforted and faith strengthened.

Twenty-three friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Twelve parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; three wives, their husbands; twenty-five friends, for the conversion of relatives or friends.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

A Reader, Elizabeth, N. J.; Mrs. L. B. K., Athens, N. Y.; Mrs. J. A. C., Nyland, Ala.; M. L. W., Kingsley, Pa.; E. N., Ontario, Calif.; L. C. C., Saybrook, Ill.; L. M. D., Meredith, N. H.; F. P., Oakwood, Ohio; A Reader, Winchester, Va.; Mrs. S., Barnes City, Iowa.

determining Christian character and action in reference to the pressing problems of the hour."

It was also decided by the Conference that the next Conference should be held at Philadelphia, May 27 to June 1, 1919.

ONE thing, at least, this truly remarkable gathering made one feel, namely, that the chief business of the preacher and teacher of this specific doctrine is with Revelation. It is not so much to make the belief in Christ as Redeemer and Coming King reasonable, as to make it real. That is the supreme necessity. The doctrine must have effect on conduct. As Dr. Riley put it in the closing word of the Conference, it must produce in its proclaimers and defenders, "sanctity, soberness and sincerity." Then, as the truth shapes itself anew, with fresh vigor and emphasis in the individual souls of its advocates—to be delivered, in trust, in the power and inspiration of Him who gave it—such advocates will realize that the Highest owns them as His appointed ambassadors, through whom not only is the treaty of peace sealed again that authenticates the reconciliation between man and God, but by and through whose word, men and women shall come to yearn with eagerness and wait in patience and with confidence for the Coming of the King.

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

A Co-ordinated, Constructive Teaching
Being the Addresses Delivered at the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference,
May 28-30, 1918

THE Conference of eminent Bible Teachers and Authorities on Prophetic Interpretation in the United States and Canada, held at Philadelphia May 28th to 30th, 1918, was the most notable and authoritative gathering of its kind ever held in this country. The finest consecrated scholarship of all the Christian denominations was represented, and the deliberations and addresses on "The Return of Our Lord and Related Events" possess a vital spiritual interest to Christian men and women throughout the world. In view of the extraordinary manifestations of interest in the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference, an arrangement was made for the publication by the Christian Herald of the proceedings and addresses of the Conference in a volume entitled "Light on Prophecy."

"Light on Prophecy" is published under the special supervision of the Committee of the Conference, and is the only volume to receive official authorization. The book is of 300 pages, containing all the addresses, about twenty in number. The addresses will be welcomed by Bible lovers everywhere, and especially by the constantly growing number of those who believe that we are living in a time of prophetic fulfillment.

Notable Speakers and Addresses

Below is a List of the Addresses Which Are Included in "Light on Prophecy"

- "Hath God Spoken?" and "What is to Become of the Church?"
By Dr. Harris H. Gregg, Pastor, of Winnipeg, Canada, an eminent Canadian Divine.
- "Where Is Christ Now and What Is He Doing?"
By Rev. John M. McInnes, of Syracuse, Secretary of the Montrose Bible Conference.
- "The Doctrine of Our Lord's Return"
By Dr. Mark A. Matthews, Former Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church.
- "The Answer to the Greatest Question Jesus Ever Asked" and "What Manner of Persons Ought We to Be?"
By Dr. William B. Riley, of the First Baptist Church of Minneapolis, Minn., and President of the Northwest Bible School, Bible teacher and lecturer.
- "Did the Cross of Christ Fulfill All the Promises?"
By W. L. Pettingill, Dean of the Philadelphia School of the Bible.
- "God's Purpose in This Dispensation" and "Regathering of Israel in Unbelief"
By Dr. James H. Gray, of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, Ill.
- "The Capture of Jerusalem"
By Rev. A. E. Thompson, A.B., Pastor of the American Church at Jerusalem.
- "War on German Theology"
By Dr. Cortland Myers, Pastor of the Tremont Baptist Temple, Boston, Mass.
- "Coming Events Cast Their Shadows" and "Will There Be Any Tears in Heaven and Why?"
By Rev. P. W. Philpott, Hamilton, Canada.

whom he would find it necessary to serve in France. It was also suggested that he might be sent to Italy.

AN UNLIMITED ARMY. The Committee on Military Affairs of the House sent in its report on the Army Appropriation Bill on May 25. The measure as drawn grants the President power to call as many men under the Selective Service Act as can be trained, equipped and transported to Europe. It said that the administration would have 3,000,000 men in France within the shortest possible time. The Bill authorized expenditures of a total of $11,041,681,909, and was passed by the House unanimously on May 31.

EMBALMED BEEF. The Spanish War and its unsavory meat scandal were brought to mind, on May 26, by charges filed by the Federal Trade Commission against Morris & Co., and Wilson & Co., charging them with offering for sale to the American Army meat unfit for consumption by American soldiers.

KAISERS SIGN WAR TREATY. London dispatches, on May 30, transmitted the text of a treaty between Germany and Austria, which was published in the Deutsche Volkzeitung. The treaty is signed by the German Kaiser and the Kaiser of Austria and binds the two monarchs in a close military alliance for twenty-five years, pledging the entire strength of their peoples for military purposes in order that the future war may be of brief duration. The treaty provides that all male inhabitants of both nations capable of bearing arms shall receive proper and thorough military instruction. Emperor Charles, following his return from a conference with Emperor Wilhelm, has been reported as opposing any change in Austria's treatment of her subject nationalities.

WESTERN UNION DEFIES UNION. A strike of 30,000 commercial telegraphers in the employ of the Western Union Telegraph Company appeared imminent on June 3. Former President Taft and Frank P. Walsh, representing the National War Labor Board, recommended a settlement which involved modified recognition of the union. President Newcomb Carlton of the Company declared as between unionization and Government control he would prefer the latter.

SUBMARINE OFF JERSEY COAST. On the night June 2, a German submarine appeared off the Jersey coast. The American sailing ship, Edward H. Cole, 1,791 tons, one steamship and two or three other vessels were known to have been sunk. At noon, on June 3, the total bag of the submarine was reported as in the neighborhood of 15 vessels. The port of New York was closed on June 3, no vessels being permitted to leave, while American destroyers and submarine chasers went after the pirates. It was impossible at this writing to be sure whether this was the exploit of a single U-boat or the beginning of a definite attempt to interfere with the transport of American troops to France.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. President Wilson by proclamation, on May 30, established three new National Forest Reserves, to be known as the White Mountain in Maine and New Hampshire, Shenandoah in West Virginia, and the Natural Bridge in Virginia. The White Mountain Forest includes about 391,000 acres, the Shenandoah about 165,000, and the Natural Bridge about 102,000. ... The Y. M. C. A. War Council planning to multiply by 200 per cent. its forces in France and Italy, began early in June a campaign to secure 3,200 men and 800 women for work with the American troops. ... Secretary McAdoo has authorized the combination of all of the Express Companies in the country into one big company to be known as the American Railroad Express Company to unify the service throughout the nation. ... Thomas J. Mooney, convicted of murder at San Francisco, in whose interests labor leaders and many others convinced of his innocence had vainly sought a new trial, was sentenced to death on May 28. ... The Madison Square Presbyterian Church of New York closed its doors Sunday morning, May 26, Dr. Chas. H. Parkhurst preaching his last sermon. The church has been combined with the First Presbyterian Church. ... Nicholas, once Czar of all the Russias, with his family has been removed from Tobolsk to Ekaterinburg in the Urals. ...

back five miles to the line of Soissons, Epaghy, Blerancourt and Noyon, where they held the German attacks. At Rheims, the British took position in force on the Mountain of Rheims, south of the city, and the French retook Thillois to the west. South of Soissons, the advancing enemy reached the high road from Soissons to Château Thierry on the Marne crossing this road at Hartennes but being held by the French reserves from further advance along this western leg of the new salient. Southward from Rheims the line was somewhat indeterminate, the Germans being at Savigny, before Ville-en-Tardenois and on the north shore of the Marne, before Dormans. The Marne was reached on May 31 on a ten-mile front from Dormans to Château Thierry, but neither town was in German hands. The reaching of the Marne gave a total penetration in four days of fighting over 28 miles from the Ailette. The Germans claimed the capture of 45,000 men, 400 guns and many thousands of machine-guns. They were using 40 divisions with 40 more held in reserve.

THE fighting of Saturday, June 1st, lifted a little the curtain that had masked the German plan in the present battle across the Aisne, which has been dubbed, the Battle for Paris. It was evident that the battle was an attempt to widen the Picardy salient. The enemy satisfied himself with the strengthening of his positions on the Marne. But between the Marne and Rheims and the Marne and Soissons the German masses were driven eastward and westward to widen the salient. An attack was made both east and south of Rheims. The Germans succeeded in taking Fort Pompelle east of the city. A French counter-attack drove them back, taking 200 prisoners and capturing 4 tanks.

South of Rheims the Germans reached Ville-en-Tardenois on the road from Dormans to Rheims, but were unable to progress further. French reserves coming into action began on June 2 to reverse the general direction of the battle movement.

On the western leg of the salient from Château Thierry to Noyon, the fighting of June 1st gave the German masses, pressing westward, considerable gains. Northwest of Soissons the enemy gained three miles, being stopped at Nouvron and Fontenoy. Between Hartennes and Château Thierry he gained five miles along the valley of the Oureq, reaching Neuilly St. Front. On June 2nd additional gains of nearly 2 miles past Neuilly St. Front were largely lost to the French, whose forces were beginning to offer successful resistance everywhere and to attain driving force at the critical points. American and French reserves were marching into action on June 2.

THE 18,000-ton former German liner, President Lincoln, was torpedoed in the war zone at 10.40 A. M. on May 31st and sunk within an hour. The President Lincoln was in the transport service and was returning home with a crew of 700 and some wounded men, of whom 24 were reported missing. Greek troops took the offensive on the Struma front in the Balkans on May 31, advancing 2 kilometers on a front of 12 kilometers, taking 1500 Germans and Bulgarians as prisoners.

Up with the Stars and Stripes

I SAW a great "Win the War" parade recently. I saw thousands of patriotic people marching up Fifth Avenue—mothers, there were, and Civil War veterans, and boys in khaki who had faced machine gun fire Somewhere in France. I saw stolid Indians—representatives of the world's oldest democracy—and men from the Orient; I saw cowboys, and school girls, and little yellow-haired children. And they were all marching under the same flag—the Stars and Stripes.

Standing in the crowd on the pavement I felt myself growing prouder and prouder. I wanted to shout aloud, "It's my flag, too, my flag." And all about me I could see the same sort of pride reflected on the faces of other folk who felt as I felt.

It is a marvelous thing to see the symbol of a nation go by to the accompaniment of reverently uncovered heads and stirring music. For it brings home a great truth—a truth that our boys Over There are fighting for, and dying for.

I am sure that you feel the pride in your nation's flag that I feel. And if you do—if you honor that flag and the men who are upholding it—you should have it in your home.

THESE are strenuous times. They are the times when the real patriot makes his patriotism known. And the simplest, most effective way to do that is to show the colors of patriotism—the Red, White and Blue.

The Christian Herald wants you to be the sort of a patriot who shows his patriotism to the world. And so the Christian Herald has arranged to procure for every reader who wants one, a splendid American flag (size 4x6 feet), the sort of a flag that you'll be proud to hang in your window on Independence Day—and every day. If you want one—and you surely will—send $2.75 to the Christian Herald. This will pay, not only for the flag, but for a renewal of your subscription to the Christian Herald for another year.

You can also procure this flag without cost by interesting some one who is not now a reader of the Christian Herald to become a subscriber for one year at the regular subscription price of $2.00 a year. Just send us a new subscriber with $2.00—we'll send you the flag as a reward.

Let your children get their first lessons in patriotism at home. If you stand firmly behind the principles of the nation, let the flag tell it. Pledge your allegiance to your country by displaying the flag.

I am sure that every loyal American who does not already own a flag will want this one.

Order this flag today—and unfurl it on Independence Day and every day. Send your order to me, addressed The Christian Herald, 1399 Bible House, New York, and I will see that the flag is sent to you at once.

That This $49 Typewriter Was $100

The Sales Policy Alone Is Changed, Not the Machine

The Oliver Nine—the latest and best model will be sent direct from the factory to you upon approval. Five days free trial. No money down. No salesmen need influence you. Be your own salesman and save $51. Over a year to pay. Mail the coupon now.

This is the time when patriotic American industries must encourage intelligent economy by eliminating waste. New economic adjustments are inevitable.

So March 1, 1917, we announced The Oliver Typewriter Company's revolutionary plans. We no longer have an expensive sales force of 15,000 salesmen and agents, nor costly offices in 50 cities. The entire facilities of the company are devoted exclusively to the production and distribution of Oliver Typewriters.

Price Cut In Two

By eliminating these terrific and mounting expenses, we reduced the price of the Oliver Nine from the standard level of $100 to $49.

This means that you save $51 per machine. This is not philanthropy on our part. While our plan saves you much, it also saves for us.

There was nothing more wasteful in the whole realm of business than our old ways of selling typewriters. Who wants to continue them? Wouldn't you rather pocket 50 per cent for yourself?

The Identical Model

The Oliver Typewriter Company gives this guarantee: The Oliver Nine we now sell direct is the exact machine—our latest and best model—which until March 1, 1917, was $100.

This announcement deals only with a change in sales policy.

The Oliver Typewriter Company is at the height of its success. With its huge financial resources it determined to place the typewriter industry on a different basis. This, you admit, is in harmony with the economic trend.

A World Favorite

This Oliver Nine is a twenty-year development. It is the finest, the costliest, the most successful model that we have ever built.

More than that, it is the best typewriter, in fifty ways, that anybody ever turned out. If any typewriter in the world is worth $100, it is this Oliver Nine.

It is the same commercial machine purchased by the United States Steel Corporation, the National City Bank of New York, Montgomery Ward & Co., the Otis Elevator Company, the Pennsylvania Railroad and other leading businesses. Over 600,000 have been sold.

Simplified Selling

Our new plan is extremely simple. It makes it possible for the consumer to deal direct with the producer.

You may order from this advertisement by using the coupon below. We don't ask a penny down on deposit.

When the typewriter arrives, put it to every test—use it as you would your own. If you decide to keep it, you have more than a year to pay for it. Our terms are $3.00 per month. You are under no obligation to keep it. We will even refund transportation charges if you return it.

Or if you wish additional information, mail coupon for our proposition in detail. We immediately send you our de luxe catalog and all information which you would formerly obtain from a typewriter salesman.

10 Cents a Day

In making our terms of $3.00 a month—the equivalent of 10 cents a day—it is now possible for everyone to own a typewriter. To own it for 50 per cent less than any other standard machine.

Regardless of price, do not spend one cent upon any typewriter—whether new, second-hand or rebuilt—do not even rent a machine until you have investigated thoroughly our proposition.

Remember, we offer here one of the most durable, one of the greatest, one of the most successful typewriters ever built. If anyone ever builds a better, it will be Oliver.

Don't Pay $100

Why now pay the extra tax of $51 when you may obtain a brand new Oliver Nine—a world favorite—for $49?

Cut out the wasteful methods and order direct from this advertisement.

Or send for our remarkable book entitled, "The High Cost of Typewriters—The Reason and the Remedy." You will not be placed under the slightest obligation.

SOMETIMES

We were a robber band
Sometimes,
And others,
We were a scouting party,
Or blood brothers
Of some wild clan -
Sometimes my pal was a fierce ogre man,
And I a knight,
And we would fight

With magic forces.

The very woods rang with a prancing tread.
Our unseen horses -
Sometimes we'd walk on tip-toe Cautiously,
And peer around the leafy boughs
To see
Strange beasts a-graze....

The summer days
Were all too short, and all too swift in going,
And yet, unknowing,
We played sometimes that we were robbers bold
With wealth untold.

We did not dream that we were really rich
In childhood's gold.

The Submarine War Comes Here

Twelve Ships Sunk in Three Days Along the Middle Atlantic Coast. Our Chasers Active

ON Monday, June 3, Americans awoke to a realization of the fact that the great war had suddenly come to our shores. It was a rude awakening, for over a year had passed without anything happening to disturb our equanimity on this side of the Atlantic. Now came the startling news that a force of undersea boats, operating off the Delaware Capes and along the New Jersey coast, had attacked and sunk a number of our coastwise vessels. Yet it was not wholly unexpected, for, ever since the visits of the U-boats to this country before America's entry into the war, the public mind had discounted the probability of the invasion of American waters by the submarines, sooner or later.

The first information of the raid reached New York when Captain H. G. Newcomb and ten members of the crew of the four-masted American schooner Edward H. Cole arrived early in the morning, bringing the intelligence that their vessel had been sunk at 4:20 P. M. on Sunday, June 2, some fifty miles southeast of Barnegat, N. J. While each told the same story with some difference in details, all were agreed that the attacking submarine was about 200 feet long, with over 20 feet beam and 5 feet of freeboard; that she carried a three-inch gun forward and another aft and a quick-firer amidships, and had a speed of not less than seventeen knots. Robert Lathige, the mate, a native of Boston, said:

"It was just about ten minutes to four o'clock when I saw a submarine appearing on the surface, half a mile away from the port bow. Our vessel was averaging about three knots and had been going at that speed for nearly twelve hours. The day was clear and we could distinguish objects five miles distant on the horizon. We had a cargo of coal and were bound from Norfolk to Portland. At first, when Karl V. Karlson, a Finn, who was at the helm, called my attention to the submarine, it was moving around our ship at high speed. We both believed it to be an American, probably with some of the Naval Reserve cadets on board, who were trying to have some fun with us fellows.

"I went to the skylight and called down to the captain to tumble up lively on deck, as there was a big submarine close astern, getting ready to attack us. Then I took a look at the U-boat through the conning tower shouted in English, asking the name of our ship. I told him it was painted on the stern, but he repeated the question, and then I gave him her name. Our captain came on deck, and just then we got a hail from the U-boat to 'heave to' and they would send an officer on board. The tall officer with three men came off in a dingy, and he boarded us and inquired about the cargo, tonnage, and ports of departure and destination. Then he made a brief inspection of the ship, after which he came up to the captain and said: 'Get your crew together and tell them they have ten minutes to leave the ship.'

It was 4:10 when the crew of the Cole rowed off, taking neither water nor food, and no compass, though the captain brought his sextant and barometer along. They saw the Germans attach four bombs to the vessel, two on each side, and light the fuses. Five minutes after they pulled away, the bombs exploded, and the Cole began to go down by the bow. As she was settling, the submarine fired a single shell from her bow gun, which struck amidships. Fifteen minutes later, the schooner had disappeared.

THE men of the Cole saw a cloud of smoke on the horizon, and the U-boat darted off at full speed in that direction, probably anticipating another victim. A little after 5 o'clock several shots were heard, and the men in the boat could see, some four or five miles away on the starboard, an attack on a small steamship, probably a tanker, which a little later went down by the stern. About 6 o'clock firing was again heard, but the boat was then too far off to distinguish objects clearly, although, as there seemed to be a return fire, they concluded that the U-boat had attacked an armed marine glasses, and after a moment, when a puff of wind blew the ensigns straight, I could see that it was the German flag; so I sang out again to Captain Newcomb: 'It's no joke. She's a German submarine all right.'

The Rural Church and the Farmer

By
J. W. HENCEROTH

THE beautiful story of the vine and its branches when Christ said: "I am the vine, ye are the branches" bears a vital relation to our present-day religious and agricultural life. The great Vine, of which every country person should be a living branch, is "the country church." Yet how can it bear fruit if its members are out of harmony with one another and with Nature, are financially unprosperous, and the agriculture of the community so loosely organized that the people are in a daily struggle for the necessities of life?

During the past few years the studies made of the country church have shown that there is a vital connection between the prosperity and spiritual life of the church and the daily and economic life of the community—between successful agriculture and religion.

In six counties studied in Ohio where agriculture was prosperous 34 per cent. of the country churches were growing and where agriculture was suffering, but 21 per cent. The great work of the country church is to convert men to Christianity, yet this conversion is making them more efficient in their life work. Many of our wide-awake churches are inspiring their members to carry the fundamental teachings and spirit of the Great Master into their daily life. As a result, the members are better citizens and farmers than are the non-church members of the same community.

PRACTICALLY every story of the great characters of the Bible deals with them in their relation to agriculture in their community—to nature and nature's God. The sturdy, heroic and outstanding Bible Christians were judged by their herds and flocks of cattle, sheep, horses, asses and oxen. The very fact that these men were living close to nature's God made them better farmers and herdsmen—better real citizens. Why should it be different today?

poeketbooks don't go well together. If a minister can show his flock how to cooperate in raising bigger and better crops, how to market them to the best advantage and thus develop a prosperous rural folk, he will have a live, up-and-doing rural church. The rural minister of today must be a real part of his entire flock. Such a man brings the boys in rather than seares them away. We had such a man as this in our church for five years. He was always out with the boys and men. He played ball, and was a good player too. He organized a rural Y. M. C. A., a of the agriculture of that time. If the great Teacher and the other authors of Bible stories were here today they would teach the same truths, but they would use modern terms. They would tell their stories in terms of purebred live stock, re-cleaned seed, legumes, nitrogen, phosphoric acid, potash, deep plowing, soil mulches, cover crops, automobiles, and all the other essentials that go with modern life. The lessons would be as true, as pertinent, as gripping, yes, and as sacred, as those of the Bible that are so dear to us.

Did you ever consider that practically every religious organization established as a community was settled on a farm? We need but cite the Shaker settlement of South-western Ohio and the Mormon settlement of Utah. In every case the religious leader was also the agricultural leader. While many do not agree with the religious teachings of the Mormons, they have to admire the way they brought down the mountain waters, irrigated the trackless deserts and made them blossom as the rose.

FARMERS are the only people of modern times whose work is intimately concerned with their daily living. They are the only people whose business, home life and religion can be intertwined as were the lives of the Bible characters. There are great principles of nature with which the farmer must work. Back of these great principles or laws stands the Infinite One that controls them, and it is our duty to know and work in harmony with these laws and the One that made them. There is poetry and romance on the farm. There is joy, money and pleasure in farming, if we, in our daily work, are in harmony with the great laws and forces of nature.

With Cowper we can well say, "God made the country and man made the town." We as country people certainly have a great privilege in being close to nature and to nature's God as expressed in every tree that grows, in every babbling brook and each tiny flower that blows, as well as in the churches that raise their spires heavenward.

Woman's session of a Farmer's Institute held in a country church in Ohio

Y. M. C. A. ball team and a rural Bible class, and took an active part in the Farmers' Institutes and Farmers' clubs. He taught and preached the most up-to-date agriculture and religion for the church. As a result, the Sunday school and every church department was alive and growing. The people were prosperous and happy, and the church was alive spiritually. Such conditions as this should be in every rural community. Our ministers should be authorities on marketing, good seeds, soils, fertilizers, dairy cattle, spraying. They should know as much as they do about the Jebusites, the Hittites, and all other "ites" of the Bible, but along with this they should know more about the Millersburgites, Podunk Cornerites, and other "ites" of their community.

The Bible stories were told in terms that the people understood, and most of them are in terms vessel. The captain and men of the Cole were picked up later by the United States naval collier Bristol. There was more firing toward dusk, but at a considerable distance.

The Bristol's captain expressed the belief that as sounds of gunfire had come from different quarters, there must be two submarines working together off our coast.

Other reports followed in quick succession the news of the sinking of the Cole, indicating that the U-boat or boats were working on a wide area along our Atlantic coast.

The steamer Texel, 3,210 tons, with a cargo of sugar valued at $2,000,000, was sunk sixty miles off New York harbor on the same afternoon that saw the Cole destroyed. The Texel had only been taken over lately by the United States Shipping Board from the Dutch government. Her crew were hurried into boats and the vessel was blown up with bombs. The men were picked up after thirty-two hours' exposure on the sea and taken into Atlantic City, N. J.

A steamer arriving in New York on Tuesday morning, June 4, reported picking up at sea an empty motor boat of the New York and Porto Rico liner Carolina. The hull of the motor boat had been pierced by the fire of a U-boat's guns. The Carolina, as was learned definitely later, had been attacked and sunk at 6 o'clock on Sunday evening by U-boat 37, while 150 miles southeast of the Delaware Capes. Of 331 persons believed to have been on board, nineteen landed safely in the ship's boat at Lewes, and twenty-nine at Atlantic City, while 244 were taken up by the schooner Eve B. Douglas. Sixteen of the passengers are believed to have perished during a storm at sea through the overturning of one of the small boats. The Carolina was a staunch and swift vessel of 5,093 tons.

SO far as could be gathered up to Sunday, June 9, sixteen vessels, including the Norwegian liner Eibsvold, sunk off the Virginia Capes on June 5, had been caught in the U-boat raid and destroyed, those aboard being saved by the small boats or by passing ships later. The list is as follows:

The Pratt, apparently the victim of a mine, was beached and safely floated the following day. The Edna was towed in, little damaged. Trawlers picked up twelve mines in the steamer lanes leading out from the Delaware Capes which made it appear probable that the Tanker Pratt had struck a mine.

Off the Maryland coast a United States destroyer heard a German raider exchanging shots with the French steamer Radioline. The destroyer started in pursuit of the raider, which submerged, and firing was heard for several hours by passing vessels. The Radioline was undamaged.

Almost as soon as the first evidences of the raid were received, our coast patrol vessels began an active and wide-circling search for the raiders.

It was reported that two U-boats, the U-37 and the U-151, each with stores enough to last three months, were leading in the attacks on American shipping. Both are said to be submarines of the cruiser type, of large tonnage. It was claimed in some quarters that it will very likely develop that no less than five submersibles were engaged in the raids. On June 6 they were being hunted by American destroyers, submarines, aircraft and submarine chasers. Reports were current of the capture of one of the U-boats near Boston, but at the Navy Department in Washington nothing was known of such an event.

There were no sinkings from June 5 until the eighth when the Cuban-American liner Pinar del Rio was torpedoed seventy-five miles off the Maryland coast. These bold attacks so close to our shore have sharpened expectation as to future possibilities. One returning transport reported being chased by a submarine.

The Harpathian was attacked at 9 A. M. on June 5, 100 miles off the Virginia Capes and was apparently torpedoed. The Vinland was sunk at 6 P. M. on the fifth, sixty-five miles off the Capes. Both vessels were Norwegians and both crews were safely landed. The submarines appeared to be moving south, but had eluded the American submarines destroyers, chasers, dirigible balloons and seaplanes although their patrol was being widened and the net more tightly drawn.

POLICE Commissioner Enright, of New York, after conferring with the military authorities in connection with U-boat activities, ordered that the metropolis must be kept dark at night save for the light of the street lamps, and that the same rule must be applied to Coney Island, Staten Island and at all seaside resorts until further orders, this rule to include display lights of every character and the illuminations at seaside pleasure resorts.

The same official has issued a notice that in the event of airplane raids on New York or contiguous territory, siren horns or whistles will sound continuously for ten minutes as an alarm, and that people everywhere should "open the windows of their homes or offices and go at once to the cellar." When the danger has passed short blasts of the sirens or whistles at intervals of one minute each will signify "all clear."

American Troops Halt Germans

AS we went to press last week the German advance from the Aisne to the Marne appeared to be ending and the battle lines were fast becoming fixed. On June 6 the military correspondent of the Berlin Vossische Zeitung sent this illuminating paragraph to the German public: "The German supreme command cannot well proceed now against the newly consolidated French front which is richly provided with reserves, and bear the great losses which experience shows are entailed by such operations." This dispatch was sent after 3 days of fruitless fighting in which the German massed attacks had been mown down by French and American artillery fire.

On Monday, June 3, the Germans made two bids for the southern bank of the Marne, crossing at Jaulgonne, midway between Château Thierry and Dormans, and surging into that part of Château Thierry, north of the Marne, expecting to cross with a rush to the southern side over the two bridges spanning the stream. American troops protecting the southern bank made short shrift of the German forces which had crossed the river, driving them back, destroying their foot bridge and taking prisoners. At Château Thierry American machine gunners reached the southern end of the bridges as the Germans began to enter in force the northern section of the city. The American troops with a company of French Chasseurs crossed the bridges, and deployed for their protection. In a short, sharp fight in the streets with their machine guns they cleaned the city of Germans, then withdrew to the southern shore, mining the bridges. Later in the day the Germans returned, swarmed onto the bridges, and when nearly across found themselves cut off by the blowing up of the center spans, while the American machine guns poured into them a vigorous fire. During the next day the American and German machine guns fought a battle across the river; the Germans being completely mystified by the skill of the Americans, in hiding their gun emplacements. The battle ended with one American killed, while some thousand Germans will not fight again. On the same day American marines rushing into action on motor lorries launched an attack against the Germans, pressing forward in the woods of Veully la Poterie, at first driven back, by a counterattack, they finally drove the Germans from the woods.

On June 6 American marines in conjunction with French forces attacked the Germans west of Château Thierry, driving them back for two miles along a front of two miles and a half, gaining complete control of the heights, inflicting many casualties upon the enemy and capturing 100 prisoners. The French captured 160. In addition to the prisoners the Americans captured 10 machine guns.

On the same day the Americans completed the clearing of Veully wood of Germans. Thursday, June 6, also saw the Germans defeated in an attempt to cross the Oise south of Noyon.

American troops going into battle at Veully, decorated their helmets with poppies and went into action whistling "Yankee Doodle."

The American marines, fighting southwest of Château Thierry faced a Saxon division on Tuesday, a Guard division on Wednesday, and on Thursday a crack Prussian division with a battalion of Jaeger sharpshooters.

THE American marines drove on throughout June 6, forcing back the crack Prussian troops in spite of successfully hidden and skillfully served machine guns, the total capture of prisoners by the Americans alone in three days' fighting exceeding 300, and many machine guns were taken, the crews either being captured or killed. On June 6 the Americans captured Toney and Bouresches, while the French on their left reached Bussières and Vinly. The Americans had taken all of Belleau wood and were fighting for the village of Belleau. Twenty-five American marines drove 200 Germans out of Toney. After the first day's fighting a marine officer, talking to a correspondent, said: "We have not made our objective because we had none, but we have attained our object which was to stop the German drive. It is stopped."

On the eastern leg of the Marne salient, attempts of the Germans to advance south of Rheims succeeded at first in taking some ground, including the town of Bligny. British counterattacks completely restored the former lines and retook the village.

At every point of the long line, including the vicinity of Loere in Flanders, where the Germans made temporary gains early in the week, the initiative had passed again to the Allies, who were not expected, however, to carry it to the point of a serious attack, since General Foch was apparently still playing a waiting game.

The German official report of June 6 claimed total captures since May 27th of 55,000 prisoners, including 1500 officers, 656 guns and 2000 machine guns.

While American troops were putting a finish to the second defeat of the Germans at the Marne, the American air men held the supremacy in the air over American sectors at Toul and Lunéville. Air scouts reported the Germans to be concentrating large numbers of troops in the region north of Toul, within the St. Mihiel salient. On June 2 it was announced that since April 14, when the American pursuit units were organized, 32 enemy airplanes had been shot down with a loss of only seven Americans. On June 3 three American aviators northwest of Toul engaged six Germans, shooting down one inside of the American lines. In May the British alone downed 518 German airplanes and seven observation balloons.

American patrols increased their activity in both sectors on the night of June 2nd and 3rd. The patrol of 40 men encountered a hostile patrol of double its size and held its ground three-quarters of an hour, and retired with few casualties, only when its ammunition exhausted.

If Germany has any doubts as to America's participation in the war, the events of this week should furnish the first premise of a demonstration.

ON Saturday, June 8, the Germans attacked heavily the positions held by the American troops at Bouresches. Their attacks failed with heavy losses, while the American troops, attacking, advanced in the neighborhood of Toney, the French pushing forward on their left north of Veully.

Sunday, June 9, began with an intense artillery fire along the whole front from the Marne to Arras, especially heavy between Noyon and Montdidier. After a sweeping fire from mine throwers and artillery of all gauges, using gas shells and high explosives, the Germans attacked in force at 4:30 A. M. over a 20-mile front directly south of Noyon. The French lines south of Noyon not only held but were advanced slightly. South of Montdidier they yielded, but slightly. In the center, the Germans succeeded in going forward for about two miles and a half, although their successive attacks were murderous for their own troops. They gained a foothold in the villages of Ressons-sur-Matz and Marcul where they were held by the French units who had originally defended the first line. This battle was still in progress as this issue of the Christian Herald went to press. The American positions north of Montdidier and the British positions south of Arras were held under a murderous fire throughout the day, Sunday, June 9, but no infantry attacks developed, although the enemy was known to have large forces of storm troops massed near these lines.

Child Labor Law Unconstitutional

BY a vote of 5 to 4 the Supreme Court, on June 3, found unconstitutional the child labor law, passed by the last Congress, because it encroached unwarrantably upon the rights of the states to control their own commerce. The act closed interstate commerce to the products of factories in which, within thirty days, children under fourteen had been employed, or children between the ages of fourteen and sixteen had been permitted to work more than eight hours a day, or more than six days a week, or before six o'clock A. M., or after seven o'clock P. M. The law was a part of a comprehensive plan concurred in by most of the states for the conserving of the childhood of today in the interests of the manhood and womanhood of tomorrow, a plan opposed at every step by those who are willing to exploit childhood for their own profit. The effect of the State laws was so manifestly beneficial, coupled as it usually was with compulsory education laws, and the effect on industry was so contrary to that predicted, older and higher paid help proving a measure of economy rather than of expense, that few employers in any of the states where child labor laws have been in force would now return to promiscuous employment of children in mechanical processes. But there were some states in which certain employing interests were able to prevent any real improvement in the laws governing the education and labor of childhood. It was to reach these states that the child labor bill was passed by Congress. The majority opinion of the court, written by Justice Day, declared that the act, by prohibiting the movement in interstate commerce of ordinary commercial commodities, was intended to regulate the hours of labor and the labor of children in factories within the states, a purely state authority, the act being, therefore, repugnant to the constitution in a twofold sense, transcending authority delegated to Congress over commerce, and also exerting power as to a purely local matter, to which Federal authority did not extend. Justice Holmes in a dissenting opinion, declared that the national welfare was higher than the rights of any state or states, and that Congress was clearly justified. Justice Holmes pointed out as examples the oleomargarine law, the Sherman law, the pure food and drug act, and the Mann act; all of which had been upheld by the Court. A new campaign was immediately started for the enacting of a law which the court would uphold. It was suggested that the end sought might be gained by an amendment to the Constitution extending the power of Congress to control the manufacture of goods intended for interstate commerce; or by a Federal tax on the product of child labor. Campaigns were also started to secure adequate laws in the states where childhood is not yet protected from commercial exploitation.

A Week in the World's News

THE RED TRIANGLE OVER THE SEAS. The National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A. held several meetings in New York and at Atlantic City early in June to make preliminary plans for the campaign to finance its work for the second year of service to the Army. It was finally decided to ask the country for $100,000,000, the campaign to follow the fourth Liberty Loan drive. Dr. John R. Mott, general secretary, in outlining some of the things which made this necessary, told the Council, on June 3, that within the last five or six days the Germans had captured 850 Y. M. C. A. huts, and that $500,000 had been required to replace 89 huts and dugouts lost by the British Y. M. C. A. in Flanders and Picardy. Dr. Mott called attention also to the fact that in this country in the great cantonments we have 20,000 or 30,000 or 40,000 men massed together, while the same 30,000 in France will be scattered in 30 to 60 villages, each of which must have its Y. M. C. A. workers. In addition to this there is a constant shifting of troops. Another reason for the high cost of the work abroad lies in the transportation, the railway system in France being practically broken down, requiring the transportation by automobile lorries of much material that in ordinary times would go by freight. In addition the prices on the other side are much higher than in the United States, and are constantly rising. The War Work Council is determined to maintain its work on the same scale of expansion which marks the rapidly multiplying forces in and the total number of armed men defending the Stars and Stripes will exceed 2,000,000.

ORGANIZE FOR WAR SAVINGS. The great money drives being over, the War Savings Stamp comes before us again. Team work and individual persistence are united in the War Saving Societies being organized throughout the country. These societies promote thrift, increase community feeling, and aid the government. If you are not a member join the society nearest you. If there is

America and France. This means money. No money could be better spent. Dr. Mott said one great reason why the organization would spend anything that was needed was because of the extreme devotion to the nation of the men who are "Over There." He said that one of the boys had said to him: "I have had it out with death." Dr. Mott said, "That is true of every American boy. They have thought the thing through and are ready to pay the extreme price, and that is what has put the strain of grandeur in every one of these boys. We must get more than $100,000,000. We must get overseas by September at least 4,000 more American workers, of whom about one-fifth should be women."

THE CLASS OF 1918. On June 5 throughout the country, under the direction of the exemption boards, the boys who in the year just passed had become men of 21 enrolled for service under the flag of the nation. It was expected that at least 1,000,000 young men would thus be added to the available fighting material with which Uncle Sam will settle the battle for the world's liberty. As these men were registering the provost marshal sent out a call to the Governors of the states for 200,000 registrants to report to their cantonments between June 24 and 28. When these men are in khaki, the National Army will have enrolled 1,595,704 men, no society for you to join, start one. Full information may be obtained by addressing the War Savings Society Bureau, National War Savings Committee, 51 Chambers Street, New York City. Uncle Sam is seeking War Savings volunteers.

FROM CONSCRIPTION TO ENLISTMENT. Following the arrest of the Sinn Fein leaders, Lord French called for 50,000 voluntary recruits from Ireland to restore the Irish units in the British Army; with 2,000 to 3,000 monthly after October 1 to maintain the divisions at full strength. The proclamation also declared that measures were under consideration to make land available for the men who have fought for their country. Irish leaders of all shades welcomed this proclamation as an abandonment of Irish conscription.

THE RUSSIAN TURMOIL. Belgian officers returning home from Russia by way of Siberia and the United States declared in New York on June 2 that if the Allies would send a force into Russia immediately, all loyal Russians would unite at once to fight against the Germans, whom they hate bitterly. It appeared probable, on June 5, that an Allied expedition, in which Japanese would predominate, would soon be organized in Siberia to work its way westward. In the meantime the Germans were advancing farther into the interior of Russia. There was also a rumor of a country-wide plot against the Bolsheviks and a report of a secret treaty between Germany and Finland, by which the Finnish army would be placed under German leadership and a monarchy established under a German prince. On June 5 Russian troops were reported to have routed the Turks in Transcaucasia, the Turks and Germans retreating, massacring the population as they retired.

KAISER WANTS HIS RELATIVE. It was announced in Washington, on June 7, that Germany had demanded the release of Franz von Rintelen, a German naval officer now serving a prison term in the United States, with two more prison terms still to follow. The officer is said to be a distant relative of the Kaiser. Germany offered to exchange for him a naturalized American, named London, held in Warsaw as a spy, and reprisals were threatened in case Washington did not agree to the exchange. Secretary Lansing in refusing to make the exchange, in lieu of which Germany demanded that Von Rintelen be treated as a prisoner of war, called attention of the German Government to the fact that when it came to reprisals our opportunities were greater than Berlin's.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. It was announced on June 4 that a strike order would probably go out to the telegraphers of the nation on June 5. On the following day the Western Union Company announced bonuses of 2½ to 4 per cent., payable on October 1, to all employees who had been continually in the employ of the company since April 1. . . . The United States minister to Denmark, Maurice F. Egan, resigned on June 5 because of ill health. . . . Air mail service between New York and Boston was instituted on June 6. . . . A jury at Edwardsville, Ill., on June 1 acquitted fifteen men charged with the lynching on April 5 of the German labor agitator Prager. . . . The Red Cross drive, announced to have finished its course at $150,000,000, was swelled by later returns to $166,439,291, which was the record on June 2. . . . Penny postage ceased in Britain on June 2, after seventy years. The British domestic postage was raised to three halfpence. . . . Ramon Valdez, president of Panama, died on June 3 of heart failure. . . . The Uruguayan government has arranged for the purchase of the 980 miles of railroad in Uruguay operated by the British-owned Central Uruguay Railway. . . . Former Senator and Vice-President Charles Warren Fairbanks died at Indianapolis, Ind., on June 4. He was born May 11, 1852, in a log cabin in Ohio. . . . The Red Cross is conducting a campaign for 25,000 nurses for service abroad. It is realized that this means stripping the hospitals and communities at home, but it is expected that graduate nurses now married or retired will return to work in sufficient numbers to make good the deficiency. . . . American shipyards in May launched 71 ships and completed and delivered to the government 44 ships totaling 263,571 tons. British yards built 197,274 tons. . . . The Versailles Conference on June 3 placed all the Allies on record as in agreement with the United States in favor of a free and united Poland and in sympathy with the national aspirations of Austria's subject nationalities. . . . The revolutionary movement in China is dying of financial strangulation, but disaster threatens from another quarter. On June 6 the Yangtze was rising rapidly. Changsha was under eight feet of water. . . . The House of Representatives on June 6 passed the enabling act putting in force the treaty with Canada protecting migratory birds from ruthless killing, assuring the birds of their rights to live, and real sportsmen of game in season. . . . With the wheat crop beginning in Oklahoma, the Agricultural Department, on June 7, estimated the total wheat production of the country at 931,000,000 bushels for the year.

When Christians Fight Are They Christians?

LOYAL hearts have asked this question many times. It is a proper question. Dr. Keigwin answers it fully, patriotically and spiritually next week.

The Censor, after chipping off a little bark here and there, marked Major Waters's log of his trip from New York to Cape Town for use. You will read it next week. Major Waters will soon report from Jerusalem.

"There's a Providence that shapes our ends." Sometimes folks seem selfish and situations impossible, but they come out all right when He takes hold. Mr. Stearns's story next week points the road to those ways that are "Higher than your ways."

Dr. Gray will also explain, next week, some of the often misunderstood words connected with prophecy.

Harnessing the Vast Water Powers

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

THE water powers of the United States are to be mobilized as a war asset. They are to be harnessed and used for the saving of coal. They are to be employed to take the nitrogen from the air in order that it may be used for explosives and fertilizers, and also to run the factories which are making the thousand and one things needed in this time of war.

This subject is now before Congress, and laws for damming the rivers and leasing the power sites will probably have been enacted by the time this letter is published. The great streams on our public lands are to be thrown open to private capital and an enormous increase of national energy will be the result.

Few people realize how large a place our water powers are likely to have in the life of the nation. They are among the greatest of our undeveloped resources and upon them our position as a world power may depend. According to estimates made by George Otis Smith, director of the Geological Survey, we have, outside Alaska, more than 55,000,000 horsepower easily available, and Uncle Sam's expert hydrographer, M. O. Leighton, has figured that 230,000,000 of hydroelectric power could be brought into use. The latter amount is more than five times as much as the available water powers of all Europe, and more than thirty times the possibilities of Germany and Austria-Hungary. According to Dr. Smith, we have more than 8,000,000 of hydroelectric horsepower already developed, which is considerably more than nine times the developed horsepower of Germany and Austria-Hungary. Moreover, Canada has enormous water power, and she is our big partner in the use of Niagara Falls and in the force that comes from the dropping of the waters of Lake Superior into Lake Huron through the Sault Ste. Marie canals. She is known to have something like 18,000,000 horsepower which can easily be developed, and she is already producing more hydroelectric energy than our allies in Europe.

The loss is enormous. Estimating it at 40,000,000 horsepower, it represents a loss of about 300,000,000 tons of coal per annum. This at $2 per ton, the lowest government price, equals $600,000,000, or $50,000,000 a month, year in and year out.

THE water powers of the world have not been accurately measured; but we know that the North American continent has several times as much as all Europe, and that the potential energy from harnessing the waters of the United States and Canada will make them the chief industrial centers of the world for all time to come. There are vast water powers in the streams that flow down the east side of the Mexican mountains, and the same is true of some of the countries in Central America.

South America has a few scattering water powers along the west coast. That region for more than 2,000 miles is a desert, but the melting snows of the Andes now run the street cars of Peru and there are large electric plants in Chile. The eastern side of the continent is susceptible of enormous hydroelectric development. The falls of the Iguazu on the eastern borders of Paraguay, can easily develop something like 4,000,000 hydroelectric horsepower. There are great water falls in eastern Brazil, which run the street cars and the electric lights of Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro; and there are vast water powers along the Madeira and other tributaries of the Amazon.

Africa has some mighty water falls. The falls of the Zambezi are a mile wide and 400 feet deep, and it has been estimated that they could produce 35,000,000 horsepower, or six or seven times the amount of Niagara. There are water powers on the Kongo enough to run an industrial empire, and where the Nile flows out of Victoria Nyanza are the Ripon Falls, which will some day be making the cotton cloth for the savages of that part of the world.

Asia also has great water powers, but the chief development so far has been in Japan and India, the former country using its waters for its silk mills and factories and to light some of its largest cities.

Europe has altogether about 41,000,000 of available horsepower, the chief developments being in the countries at short now of something like 1,000,000 horsepower, and the full force of the falls could be profitably used in factories devoted to the needs of war.

Next to Niagara, the greatest potential power plant of the United States is that at Muscle Shoals, Alabama. It is there that we are putting up the enormous hydroelectric plants to extract nitrates from the air for the use of munitions. The dam site was given to the United States government without cost by the Alabama Power Company, which according to its contracts should horsepower of from one to two millions, and the Pedee, Santee and Savannah Rivers each have hundreds of thousands. South of the Mason and Dixon line there are a number of streams whose names are hardly known in the North which can develop 100,000 horsepower and upward, and the whole of the southern Appalachian range has a water foundation for large industries.

THE water powers of New England are not half developed, and this is so notwithstanding the census shows that New England ranks very high in its water power development. By the last census there were little more than 31,000 water powers in the United States, only 600 of which had a capacity of 1,000 or more. Of these, the six New England states had 5,700, and from these was generated almost one-fifth of our total hydroelectric power. At that time New York headed the states in its water power development, due largely to the big plants of Niagara Falls. California came second with a total of almost a half million horsepower flowing over more than 1,000 wheels, and Maine was third, with 343,000 horsepower over about 3,000 wheels. After Maine came Massachusetts, then New Hampshire, Connecticut and Vermont.

The great developed water power of the Mississippi River is that of the big dam at Keokuk, Iowa. The electric plant there has cost something like $25,000,000, and it has a potentiality of 310,000 horsepower. At Keokuk I saw machines weighing more than one-half million pounds resting on a single bearing, and above them were generators, each of which creates enough electricity to light an automobile road around the world.

In Minnesota reservoirs have been constructed by the government with reference to the navigation of the Mississippi. These reservoirs have a capacity of almost one hundred billion feet. They have increased the power of the flour mills at the falls of St. Anthony, and have improved the power plants along the Mississippi to the amount of many hundreds of thousands of dollars per annum. Reservoirs have been built for the same purpose at the head waters of the Wisconsin River; and an enormous increase of water power could be made by carrying out plans advocated by the late Senator Newlands.

THE greatest water powers of the United States are those of our western highland and of the Pacific coast states. The Deschutes River has a drainage area about as large as the states of Massachusetts and Rhode Island combined.

Washington has a number of great water powers, including those which supply Seattle. The Spokane River, in addition to the 30,000 horsepower which it can generate in the heart of the city, has several million available horsepower above and below Spokane.

On four rivers in northern California there is available 800,000 horsepower, and San Francisco gets power from electric plants in the Sierra Nevada Mountains. Los Angeles has great power plants worked by water which is brought a distance of 250 miles, and the fall is such that the most of it occurs within fifty miles of the city. It has potentially 120,000 horsepower of electric energy.

There are enormous water power possibilities in Alaska. For 1,000 miles north of Seattle the coast is lined with steep mountains which have a heavy rainfall and many of the islands have high water falls.

Indeed, we have all over our country an enormous amount of white coal, as hydroelectric power is sometimes called, and if it could be used it would save hundreds of millions of dollars and the labor of hundreds of thousands of men now employed in our coal mines.

The great water fall of the Zambezi war and in Switzerland and Norway and Sweden. Norway has more than one-sixth of all the water power available in Europe, and more than one-fifth of the horsepower so far developed is to be found in that country.

AS it is now, something like 230,000 cubic feet of water drops down over Niagara every second. The amount was 56,000 cubic feet more before Canada and the United States began to harness the falls, and this amount has served to produce more than 500,000 horsepower. Niagara is making nitrates for explosives. She is furnishing the electric heat which produces the grinding materials for our fine machines used to make munitions and Liberty motors. She is making aluminum for airplanes, and silicon for dirigible balloons, as well as chemicals for explosives and for hospital supplies. The factories there run night and day, but they are be furnishing 35,000 hydroelectric horsepower to the nitrate plant this summer. One of the dams being erected is to be a mile wide and 105 feet in height.

IT is interesting to know where the great water powers of the United States are. The South has its full share. Something like 1,000,000 horsepower has already been developed, and it is estimated that there is sufficient fall in the rivers and streams yet to be developed to make a total of over 9,000,000 horsepower. As it is now, there are something like 14,000 water powers already in use. There are 1,400 in Alabama, more than 1,500 in Georgia, 2,600 in North Carolina and almost 2,000 in Tennessee. There are more than 2,000 in Virginia and West Virginia; and South Carolina, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri and Maryland have each hundreds of good-sized plants. The Tennessee River alone has an estimated

The Diplomacy of Duplicity

IT is intimated in the cable dispatches that the German offensive, which has somehow stagnated or come to a premature halt like its predecessors, is to be followed by a new and powerful "peace offensive." Allies and neutrals will be alike suspicious of such a plan. Karl Rosner, the German war correspondent whose intimate relations with the Kaiser have won him the title of Boswell to the All-Highest, has lately given to the world another of those characteristic utterances which the Kaiser usually makes the prelude to a new peace venture. It was while the emperor was viewing the desolation along the Marne—well back, we may be assured, from the actual fighting front—that he said, according to his biographer: "What suffering and misery France might have spared herself and her people, if the peace offer of December 12, 1916, had not been so criminally rejected." And this sympathetic utterance is shrewdly suspected as the prelude to a new venture in the same direction.

But there are many things that militate against belief in the genuineness of any peace overtures by the Kaiser. Maximilian Harden, as we have seen, has scoffed openly in his paper at the pharisaism of such propositions. We have already shown how Prince Lichnowsky, who was German ambassador to Britain at the outbreak of the war, stamped the whole attitude of his own government as insincere and Machiavellian. And now there come the confessions of August Thyssen, a German coal and iron magnate, who tells how the Kaiser was ready for war in 1911, when he sent one of his warships to seize the French port of Agadir, in Morocco. All his plans were laid, and it was only when his bankers protested that the country was not ready for war, that he desisted.

The statement of Herr Thyssen sheds a wonderful light on the Hohenzollern war policy at that time—a policy which has been steadily pursued up to the present moment. The iron magnate relates how a large number of business men, financial and commercial, were asked to support a Hohenzollern war policy on the ground that it would pay them to do so. He frankly admits that he was one of those who were led to agree to support the war plan when it was laid before the leading public men of Germany in 1912-13. "I was personally promised a free grant of 30,000 acres in Australia, and a loan from the Deutsche Bank of $450,000 at 3 per cent. Every trade and interest was appealed to. . . . These promises were made definitely on behalf of the Emperor, by Bethmann-Hollweg, to gatherings of business men, and in many cases to individuals. . . . They were made to at least eighty other persons (besides himself) at special interviews with the Chancellor. . . . They were confirmed by the Emperor, who on three occasions addressed large private gatherings of business men in Berlin, Munich and Cassel in 1912 and 1913. I was at one of these gatherings. . . . The emperor was particularly enthusiastic over the coming German conquest of India, and said: 'The vast revenues that the British allow to be taken by Indian Princes will, after our conquest, flow in a golden stream into the Fatherland.'"

It would be strange indeed if, after such examples of long and deliberate preparation for exploiting other countries, any government should seriously consider peace propositions from Germany now. Her "victorious peace" is well illustrated in the case of Russia, Rumania and Finland. Herr Thyssen's disclosures, coming at the present time, would make even the most conservative government hesitate to entertain any proposals from a source that has been so consistently devoted to the diplomacy of duplicity.

Russia Trusts Wilson

PRESIDENT WILSON'S declaration of sympathy toward Russia, together with the attitude of Arthur Henderson, the British labor leader, in backing President Wilson, has greatly strengthened the Allied cause in Russia.

The Petrograd newspaper Novoye Domosty defends the Allies and expresses gratitude to President Wilson for the friendly utterances.

Rev. Dr. Joseph Clare, a Congregational clergyman and head of the British-American Church of Petrograd, has declared on his return to this country that the people of Russia are starving not because of poor transportation of foodstuffs, but because they are afraid to plant and raise crops. As fast as they attempt to do this, their crops are confiscated by Bolshevik agents; and if they protest, they are either murdered outright or thrown into prison. Dr. Clare says that the peasants of Russia have now come to believe that President Wilson has shown genuine sympathy for them, and that if the President were to send another personal representative to that stricken country at this time, it would undoubtedly result in stopping the wholesale bloodshed and reign of terror that now exists.

Just what is best to be done for Russia in her sore need is a puzzling question, perhaps; but it is important that Russia should know, that our own people should know, and that all the world should know, that President Wilson, with our united nation at his back, is ready and willing to do for the great and as yet unwieldy new democracy whatever justice and opportunity may require or permit.

The future of the world largely depends on the fate of Russia. There is the testing ground of democracy today. In this, as in so many another grave world problem wherein human rights are critically involved, President Wilson is evidencing keen vision, sound judgment, strong courage and absolute sincerity.

The Prophetic Message

THE Prophetic Conference has come and gone. It accomplished its work well. It was in many respects the most notable religious assemblage ever held in America. During the three days' session, there was a continuous series of the largest audiences of earnest students of the Word, and especially of the prophecies, of which we have any record. As one of the speakers aptly characterized it, "It is the biggest Bible class ever known."

And this phenomenal interest does not surprise us, for the Conference dealt with the great problems that lie at the very heart of Christianity: the King and his Kingdom, and the King's Return. The Christ of the ages, the world's Redeemer and King, was exalted in all the addresses. Patient and prayerful, solemn and joyous by turns, the multitudes were reverent throughout. Constructive and helpful scholarship on the part of the speakers gave to the vast throngs light where it was most needed. The whole message of the Conference was one of cheer and confidence in the Divine Wisdom, which is working out the deep problems of Scripture and grandly fulfilling the promises. It was an expository message such as the world needs today. And it was obviously inspired of the Holy Spirit with hope and confidence, and abounded with faith in the complete fulfillment of all he has graciously promised.

The Christian Herald is glad to be the medium through which the Conference is sending forth its message to the world. We feel that the volume of addresses about to be issued is one that will meet with a wide welcome, and that it will be universally appreciated wherever it is known and read.

Our Splendid Crop Outlook

THE prospect for the crops in this country is surpassingly fine, weather conditions having been almost ideal to this time.

Reports from the winter wheat states say that there is nearly moisture enough in the ground to mature the crop. The situation as to the spring wheat is equally favorable, and a total yield of 900,000,000 bushels is indicated. Oats are now so far along and look so well that a big crop appears to be assured.

A year ago, owing to a backward spring, much of the corn acreage had not been planted up to June 1, but this year the planting was completed under uniformly good conditions.

The great drouth in Texas seems to have been effectually broken, at least over much of the territory. The cotton crop is much more promising than at this time last year.

Not only in this country but in Canada, Australia, India, Argentina and in France and England the crop prospects at present are exceptionally good.

The Submarine Raids

ALTHOUGH the invasion of American waters by the German submarines was an event foreseen, the news of the sinking of a number of American coastwise vessels, coming suddenly, made us realize that the war had reached at last to our very doors.

Germany's real purpose was doubtless to strike a blow that would consternate our people and halt the sending of our troops abroad. Instead, it has stiffened the national determination to prosecute the campaign with intensified vigor on the lines originally planned.

In creating such a diversion—which is destined to be short-lived, for we shall assuredly master the U-boats here, just as we have helped our Allies to master them in European waters—Germany practically concedes that our troops are a vital factor in the crucial struggle now going on in France. She has seen them fighting on the Marne and at Cantigny, and she looks forward with misgiving to the time when their force will be fully developed at the front, where it is growing mightier every day. And the Kaiser knows that unless this growth is checked at the source, his legions are fighting a hopeless battle.

We have been fortunate for a whole year or more in escaping attacks along our shores, although we have borne our full share of danger and suffering through submarine perils in European waters.

Good and Evil

WHO can answer the question, whence and how came evil into our world? One poet says, "Evil is only another form of good. . . . Out of evil still edueing good." In this view, evil would seem to be a discipline for greater good. This would be true of suffering, but not of sin. But the heart of humanity feels that evil ought not to be; that it must be overcome, or the universe will be a failure. Evil is possible to every human soul, and arises from the freedom of the will and from the power of choice. Satan fell from the heavenly estate seeking to usurp divine power; he chose rebellion instead of obedience. Almighty God had the choice of creating men or machines, and he decided to make man in his own image, and for his eternal family and fellowship. Man, being a creature of freedom, has the power to cast himself down the chasm of sinfulness, or to rise to goodness and greatness under the shadow and blessing of the Almighty Father. The moral law is God's own individual nature. It could not be different. His throne would fall, endorsing evil. God ever says, "Thou shalt not." Man replies, "I will."

Eternal justice must finally banish evil from his universal Kingdom of righteousness. Our Lord knew the source of evil when he said, "Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murder, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witnesses and blasphemy." Here is the reason why a soul must be born again into the Kingdom of heaven, free from evil. As a judge must condemn a guilty criminal, so the Almighty must condemn the unrepentant sinner. He must protect his government against treason and rebellion, if he would preserve peace eternally in his universe.

The Housewives' Problem

OUR good friend Marion Harland, known and beloved of American housewives everywhere, writes to us that she has received from our readers a large number of responses to her request for suggestions looking to a suitable title for her weekly contributions on domestic economy in war time. These letters have come to her from every state and many are excellent. She writes:

In all the years of my life which have been devoted to writing what may be catalogued as "Household Literature," I have seldom rebelled at the limitations of space as I do now in examining the goodly pile of letters laid before me. As readers know, it was proposed by the Christian Herald, in announcing the renewal of my connection with the magazine, that readers and friends suggest titles for the department. Choice of a name would be made when all the returns were in. No more flattering proof could be offered of the hold the Herald has upon the hearts of subscribers, and the warm interest American housewives feel in the vital question of what one correspondent aptly styles "American Loyalty in Food," than the ready and intelligent response to the proposal.

"Embarrassment of Riches" is a phrase that takes on new meaning as one studies the fourscore and eight titles submitted to the Committee of Selection. The task is obviously hopeless as our eyes run down the lines. None are meaningless; and so many are happily descriptive that to single out one, or one dozen, would be invidious.

In perplexity which is actually painful, it has been thought best to retain for the present the general title of "MARION HARLAND'S CORNER," using, from time to time, such substitutes as the matter in hand may indicate. Were it feasible for one whose every hour is mortgaged by work to write a note of thanks to each of my well-wishers and helpers herein named, it would be done gladly. As it is, may I beg these valued constituents to believe that I shall carry in mind and heart the memory of these evidences of affectionate regard, and shall work with and for them the more earnestly for the possession of a list I treasure as a personal token of love and good-will?

MARION HARLAND.

The Christian Herald joins with Marion Harland in expressing its cordial appreciation of the kindly interest these ladies have shown in the problem presented.

THE BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

Conducted By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART D. D.

"Poor Girl"

WHAT is the trouble with this girl of eighteen? Her trouble is that she finds that with all her pinching and scrimping she is unable to live on the $12,500 annual allowance provided for her under the will of her millionaire father. Her distress over her dilemma was so great that she appealed through her lawyer to the Surrogate of New York County for an addition of $7,500, making the amount of her allowance $20,000 a year. As an evidence of the justice of her claim she filed the following schedule of necessary expenses: For clothing, tailored dresses, school dresses, coats, sport-coats, sweaters, evening gowns, party gowns, lingerie, shoes, stockings, skirts, shirt-waists, jewelry, hats, auto-coats, parasols, furs, toilet articles, perfumes, ribbons, collars, laces, manicuring, shampooing and hairdressing, $3,000; for household expenses, $4,000; for insurance, etc., bonds for her guardian, burglary insurance, and insurance on household effects, $850; upkeep of her touring and limousine cars, including insurance and club dues, $5,000; for education, including tuition in French and music and contributions to church, $2,000; for "pleasure," including traveling, rent of summer cottage, railroad fares, sociables, hotel bills, luncheons, dinners, dances, and theater parties, $3,000. The last item is $1,000 to pay for the physicians, opticians and dentists she visits yearly, and for the drugs and medicines they prescribe. There are people who apparently live only to spend money. If they were wise in the spending, there might be much that is good in their plan of life, but wisdom and extravagance cannot go hand in hand. Wealth makes possible life on a generous scale, it is true, but when the rich are recklessly wasteful, when they allow the demands of a fictitious social aristocracy to obscure their mental, moral, and religious duties, they are on the road to become a force for evil both to themselves and their fellow-beings. Of all times these are the worst in which to tolerate the claim of a schoolgirl of eighteen to spend $20,000 a year on personal indulgence when men are giving their lives for their country, and when rich and poor alike are being called upon to practice the utmost economy and self-denial to give success to our flag. What a contrast this creature and buffet of luxury is to the ideal woman of industry and benevolence thus described: "She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff. She stretcheth out her hand to the poor." (Prov. 31 : 19, 20.)

Total Eclipse of Sun

MANY thousands of persons, including hundreds of amateur and professional astronomers and multitudes of non-professional beholders, observed a total eclipse of the sun on June 8, in a strip made by the moon's shadow from Washington State to Florida. Starting at the Borodino Islands south of Japan at sunrise, the line of totality extended across the Pacific Ocean, entered the United States near Aberdeen, Wash., at five minutes to three o'clock, and swept diagonally across the states, reaching Orlando, Fla., at nineteen minutes to six. Astronomers from Mount Wilson and Yerkes Observation before in the history of the world, it is said, have there been any motion pictures of the eclipse of the sun, and the scientists hope that new details will become evident. Eclipses of the sun are caused by the moon coming directly between the earth and the sun at some point in its journey around the earth. When sun, moon and earth are in a straight line, we have a total eclipse of the sun. God has ordered his creation according to his will; he has laid the course for the sun and earth and moon splendid soldiers, sailors, artillerymen and airmen. The superb manner in which the white, black and red men, men of all parties, creeds and social conditions, rally to the flag and pledge their lives in its behalf is our pride and glory, and, with the help of God, is an augury of victory. The loyalty of the black man and the red man to the nation in which the white man is supreme, suggests the brotherhood of the race and the fatherhood of God, who "hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth." (Acts 17 : 26.)

Gave All, Then Himself

LINN F. HAN-
LSON, a young Nebraska farmer, decided that his country needed him, and therefore sold his property, bought Liberty Bonds, gave to the Red Cross, and gave a thousand dollars to his church. Hanson had 240 acres near Wayne, Neb. Selling that and all his goods, he contributed $3,800 to the Red Cross. He then joined the military service and is now a member of an infantry regiment stationed at Pensacola, Fla. During the recent Third Liberty Loan campaign he took $4,500 of the bonds. President Wilson wrote Hanson the following letter: "Indirectly through a friend, I have learned of all the circumstances of your joining the military forces of the United States, and I want to send you this brief line to express my admiration of the spirit which prompted your action in leaving your farm and throwing in your fortunes entirely and unreservedly with the great country we all love and seek to serve." It is eminently proper for the head of our nation to call attention to this superb expression of loyalty. It is a sample of the devotion to country of the men rich and poor, from the stores, shops, offices and farms—even the unemployed of the streets—who have given themselves for the defense of the flag. The Nebraskan giving all and then himself appears in striking contrast to the rich young man who came to Christ and who, not willing to sell all he had and give to the poor, was refused discipleship. "Jesus said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me." (Matt. 19 : 21.)

Locomotives Too Large

AN AMERICAN railroad bought forty huge locomotives which cannot pass each other on the tracks, and are useless. There are some men so big that they will not allow any other beside them. The prophet gives this reference to a man too big for the provision made for him: "For the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it: and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it." (Isa. 28 : 20.)

Indians and the War

THE Indians in proportion to their numbers have subscribed quite liberally to the war bonds. They have taken $7,500,000 of the first and second Liberty Loans. They are nearly all members of the Red Cross Society and are earnest in its advocacy. Large numbers of them who were not citizens and hence not subject to the draft, have enlisted in the army and navy and other branches of war service, and make as he says, "I form the light and create darkness." (Isa. 45 : 7.)

WHAT would the people of China think of the telephone girls of their race in Chinatown, San Francisco? The Chinese girl in her native land is counted of so slight importance that little attention is paid to her education. She would not know how to read her own language, much less master two languages. The daughter would not be allowed to become a "hello girl." The separation of the sexes until marriage has marked the social custom of China from the earliest times. At the age of seven, girls did not eat with the boys, not even of their own families, and at ten a girl ceased to appear outside the women's apartments. She was taught by her governess to be docile and obedient, to spin and weave, to deal with the cocoons and weave the silk and make the garments and furnish material for the sacrifice. At fifteen she received the hairpin as the symbol of her having become of age; at twenty to twenty-three she married. Ancestor-worship in China makes every son welcome in the family, but girl babies in the past, especially among the poor, were often put to death, the excuse being that it was impossible to support them. What would the people of China think of the Chinese girls of San Francisco, who dare come out into the open, mingle with men, and earn an honest living at an honorable calling? One of the most hopeful solutions of the California-Chinese question is the fact that a number of the girls as well as boys and grown-up people have become Christians, friends of our civilization and religion. There are many dark things and bad places in Chinatown, but one of the bright spots is the telephone central with its intelligent, upright Chinese "hello girls." They are not lights hidden under a bushel, as the girls are in the homeland, but lights on a candlestick. Christ says this about putting mental and spiritual light so it will scatter the darkness: "Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house." (Matt. 5 : 15.)

Chinese Telephone Girls

The Good Soldier of Christ

A SERMON BY REV. C. A. MUTCH, D.D.*

TEXT—1 Tim. 4: 7. "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."

AT the time Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles, wrote these words he was a prisoner in Rome, closely confined and under sentence of death. This was not the first time he suffered imprisonment for the sake of the Name, for he tells us it was rather a common experience of his. Because of these imprisonments for the sake of Jesus Christ and his Gospel, he styles himself "the prisoner of Jesus Christ" or "the prisoner of the Lord." His deliverances from the enemies of the Cross had been so frequent and were of such marvelous character, and moreover the Spirit of God dwelt in him so mightily, that he could say that none of the things his enemies might compel him to suffer could move him to abandon the course divine wisdom had marked out for him. And now, while under sentence of death, after looking back over the way he had come, this hero of a hundred hardly contested battle-fields laid his armor by, and with the confidence begotten by the Holy Spirit, he said: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." Then looking forward he continued: "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give to me in that day; and not to me only, but unto all them that love his appearing."

Here, as well as elsewhere in Paul's writings, the Christian is represented as a soldier, his life a warfare. Every advance onward and upward is opposed. Everywhere, lurking foes seek his destruction. These foes are both external and internal, they are within and without. The Bible groups these together and names them the world, the flesh, and the devil. This trinity of evil forces never wearies of the fight, no matter how often defeated from accomplishing the object at which it was aimed.

TAKE first the world. By the world is meant the practices and customs which are simply in material things. We are exhorted to be diligent in business, we must sow and reap, we must buy and sell, it is necessary to engage in commerce and to be busy in the marts of trade. To be employed in some useful occupation is not only an economic necessity, but a moral necessity as well. Honest toil is a priceless boon. But the cares of the world should never be allowed first place in our thought or effort. This world is to be our servant, not our master. Many professing Christians are lost in the surging flood of worldliness. They manfully resist sin in its grosser forms. They are not guilty of dishonesty, or vulgarity, or impurity; but they succumb to the miasma of worldliness, "which is the subtlest enemy of the church of Christ today."

The Christian, through the mystery of the new birth, becomes a child of God. His life henceforward is hid with Christ in God. He walks not after the flesh, but after the spirit. But he is still subject to temptation. God never deprives man of the right of choice. The character of the choice man must likewise determine. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve" was the command to God's chosen people in the long ago. That is a duty we face today, and we shall continue to face it while we live. God has graciously given us natural desires and appetites, and He has made provision for their lawful gratification. The sin is to gratify them in the wrong way. Paul said: "I keep my body under." To do that we must fight, yet the victory is only through grace.

NOTHING gives the evil one so much satisfaction as the ruin of a soul. He perverts the desires and appetites. Whenever possible he directs our thoughts into improper channels. His devices to lead men astray are manifold. Whenever he can and wherever he can, he makes wrong appear right and darkness light. He is past master in the art of camouflage. Our Lord called him "the prince of this world." Paul designates him "the prince of the power of the air." He is the principal active agent in engineering the woes mankind has suffered in the past and is suffering now. The conflicts of earth simply reflect the conflicts of the spirit world. We are at war with a great conspiracy of evil; "against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." And only as we are strong in the Lord and in the power of his might, is victory assured.

Furthermore, Paul said he had "fought a good fight." Is it not a good fight when we come "to the help of the Lord against the mighty"; when we war against unrighteousness; when we plant our feet firmly upon the eternal principles of right and truth; when liberty is proclaimed to those who are in "the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity"; when we work and worship so as to please God and proclaim the unsearchable riches of God's grace? Most assuredly. To war against wrong is our exalted duty. To proclaim the kingship of Jesus is the privilege and glory of the Christian. To represent the Lord Jesus Christ among men is his holy task. It has pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe, but the kind of preaching that saves always stirs up the wrath of the devil. When one espouses the cause of right and justice and truth, a conflict with the forces of evil is inevitable. To war a good warfare, we must endure hardness as soldiers and quit ourselves like men. The appeal is always to the heroic. If we, like Paul, fight the good fight, then the victory is certain, for Christ, the Captain of our Salvation is exalted "far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come."

"I HAVE finished my course." The Christian's life is now presented from another viewpoint. It is not the soldier clothed in armor, ready for the battle, whom we see, but the athlete. The place is not now the battle-field, but the stadium. It is a contest of a different character, though none the less strenuous. In order to receive the reward which is bestowed upon the winner, it is required that he strive lawfully. No one can win on a "foul." The athlete must train for the race. Weeks, and even months, of the hardest kind of training is necessary before one is fitted to enter the lists. He must train until every member of the body is in complete control of the will, and responds instantly to every demand made upon it.

UNTIL THE ULTIMATE HOUR

By W. LIVINGSTON LARNED

I HOPE to live to see the day
When, in that barren land
Where France saw homesteads swept away,
Hope builds with eager hand.
I want to live to see young trees
Upspringing from the soil,
And hum of Industry—and bees—
A holy song of toil.
I have a firm, unflinching thought
That God walks there in France,
And o'er the land where heroes fought
Will sow a new romance.

I want to go in after years
To fields now piled with dead,
And through the consecrating tears
See blue skies overhead
Seed sown in earth of Martyrdom
Shall rise as angels rise;
Winged Plenty to that land shall come,
Sweet balm from sunny skies.
Not once in all these days of strife
Has Hope gone forth from me.
I somehow knew that there was life
Beneath the misery.

I want to live to see that hour
When grass is green once more,
When French hearts, like the rose in flower,
Their old-time incense pour.
I want to wander like a child
In some fair, magic place,
And find the hurt ones reconciled—
A smile upon each face.
Nor is there doubt—no weakening;
Lost hope—because of pain.
God, somehow, measures everything,
And France will bloom again!

The spiritual athlete also needs training. For some the race is longer than it is for others, but whether it be long or short, training is an important factor in order to win. It is necessary to "cast aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us." Anything that hinders us, or anything that might prove an encumbrance, and thus lessen our chances of winning, is to be cast aside while running the race. Perseverance is also essential, for the reward is not at the beginning, nor in the middle, but at the end of the race. To stop before the goal is reached is to suffer defeat; to suffer defeat is to lose the reward. The perseverance of the saints is not an empty phrase; it is vital to the attainment of the object we had in view when the race was begun. There are many obstacles in the way, many hindrances and many hinderers. We may have to come back to the starting-point, so to speak, once in a while and try again. Sometimes weariness overtakes us; we are troubled with doubts as to whether or not we shall be able to endure to the end. But no matter how long the course, or how strong the opposition, "so run that ye may obtain."

"I HAVE kept the Faith." That is a climactic statement and that is the secret of his splendid achievement. It was because he had kept the faith that he could fight the good fight and finish the course. It was his faith that held him true. It was faith that gave him the victory. It was his faith that made him more than conqueror through Him that loved him. Through faith he had reached the mountain tops, from whose heights he looked down into the valley and perhaps called to mind his varied experiences, and the cruel treatment he had received at the hands of his enemies as the ambassador of Jesus Christ. In spite of the treatment he had received from those who despised the Cross; in spite of the untoward circumstances, bitter experiences and great sufferings, he never lost his grip upon the eternal verities; he never questioned God's providences; he never charged God with neglect of him; he never murmured because of his hard lot, but with superb confidence in the righteousness of the war in which he had fought so valiantly, and the course he had run to the end, he could say with calmness, yet with that sublime conviction which has never failed to thrill the hearts of every true lover of God and his righteousness: "I have kept the faith." To the end he had kept the faith of the Gospel, to proclaim which he poured his life without measure.

WE are similarly tested today. These are days of stress and trouble; days of mighty upheavals in the political, industrial and social worlds. The Kingdom of heaven has by no means escaped. False teachers abound. Their doctrines are sown broadcast over the land, even inserting their false teachings in the text of the Bible itself, as was charged recently. The Virgin Birth is scoffed at; the divinity of Jesus Christ is denied; the atonement ridiculed; the inspiration of the Bible regarded as a pious fraud. Many who held the faith of the Gospel have "wrapt it reverently in a shroud of purple and laid it away where the dead gods lie." The voices of the sirens call to us from everywhere to cast off the fetters that have bound us to the so-called superstition of the past, and to accept the modern scientific interpretation of the Word of God. As was said of their prototypes of old, they too have laid aside the commandment of God, and teach the tradition of men. Those who substitute the traditions of men for the teaching of the Bible are what another has called "ecclesiastical submarines who torpedo the faith once delivered to the saints." In some quarters, to sneer at those things held most sacred by the true believer is regarded as a sure mark of scholarship. "Be progressive, up-to-date," is the advice of the false teachers to those who, in their simplicity, accept the Bible, and the whole of it, as the revealed Word of God.

Amidst the Babel of voices, it is not strange that confusion results and many fall away. Unless our moorings are in God the Father Almighty, we are in imminent peril of being swept away by the turbid waters of unbelief. The finest achievement possible to mortals is to walk with God like Enoch of old. The most inspiring message to leave our kindred when we are on the borderland of time is: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."

DAILY MEDITATION

Pedestrian Souls

SUNDAY, June 23. Isa. 40:31. "They shall mount up with wings as eagles." The title of this meditation is out of harmony with the text. And I have purposely set the two in contrast because there are multitudes of men and women who seem determined to trudge along the road as pedestrians although they were intended to have the helpful ministry of wings. They are like the Alpine insects of which Fabre tells us in his wonderful book on the grasshopper. "I do not know," he says, "why the insect deprives itself of wings, and remains a plodding wayfarer, when its near kinsman, on the same Alpine swards, is excellently equipped for flight. It possesses the germs of wings and wing-case, but it does not think of developing them. It persists in hopping, with no further ambition; it is satisfied to go on foot." These words of the great naturalist are as true of multitudes of men and women as they are of the insects that hop about the lower slopes of the Alps. They walk; they never soar. They go along the road with heavy feet; they never rise in joyful exultation. They are always on the earth. They never leave the earth, and return to it again with freshened spirits after a renewing flight in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. They have no upper air which they regard as part of their blessed inheritance. They are just trudgers and drudges when God purposed them to be able to "flee as a bird to the mountains."

What prevents us from soaring? Tennyson describes one crawling soul "who would have flown, but that his heavy rider kept him down!" Our carnal passions may crush us to the earth and keep us forever on its miry roads. Richard Baxter has this word of illumination in his "Saints' Everlasting Rest":—"Oh, the cursed madness of many who seem to be religious! They thrust themselves into a multitude of employments till they are so loaded with labour, and clogged with care, that they are unable to soar in meditation as their bodies are to leap up to the sun!" So it is evident that there is to be a lessening of the needless baggage before there can be a rising into the upper world of our inheritance.

And we cannot do this of ourselves, and there is no use in our trying. We have to just take our heavy, crawling, trudging life into the presence of our God. "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength! They shall mount up with wings!"

Spirit and Life

MONDAY, June 24. John 6:63. "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." The great Professor Max Müller, of Oxford, the most distinguished Oriental scholar of his day, the keenest student of comparative religions, looking closely into the literature and life of the Far East, said, "All other religions are either dead or dying; Christianity is the only living religion." As newspapers sometimes say, "This is important, if true." Why should it be true that Christianity is the only living religion? What is there in Christianity which goes to prove it true, or which might lead us to say, "If it is not true, it ought to be true?" Just this: Christianity is the only religion that preserves the ineradicable distinction between good and evil; that addresses itself to the problems of sin and pain and death, and that has a message to the awakening social consciousness of the world. Christianity is all this chiefly because it is a spiritual religion; spiritual, rather than formal; spiritual, and so cognizant of the problem of the spirit; spiritual, and so deals with the individual soul in all its relations both to God and to other souls. And Christianity is what it is because Christ is what He is, spiritual Master of the spirit, Builder of a kingdom within the realm of the spirit, and hence eternal.

Jesus knew the human spirit as no other ever did. The expert student of human nature reads the past life of a person from his present appearance. The downcast eyes, the averted glance, tell the story of shame; the cunning curve of the lips tells the story of greed; the evil leer tells the story of an impure mind. But there are depths of character the scientist, the trained observer, never plumbs. Indeed, there are depths in us we ourselves never know. But there is One who knows—One who knows. Jesus knew Matthew better than Matthew's friends knew him, better than Matthew knew himself. He knew Zaccheus better than Zaccheus knew himself. He knew Peter as Peter did not know himself, and knew that beneath the cowardice of the raw recruit was the heroism of a veteran. Pentecost was the vindication of that choice. The words that Jesus spoke are spirit, hence they never die.

The Forgiving of Fickleness

TUESDAY, June 25. II Tim. 4:16. "I pray God that it may not be laid to the charge." This remark of Paul is valuable, first, because it shows that Paul had the grace not to harbor resentment or plot vengeance against persons who had done him harm. They had deserted him in the hour of need. As professing Christians and brethren in the faith he had a right to expect that they would stand by him at his trial before Caesar and support his argument that he was neither a blasphemer nor a seditious person, dangerous to the Roman empire, by their witness and in whatever way they could. When they slinked away, as the disciples had done from their Lord in the night of the betrayal, their conduct had begun to trouble Paul, but behold, what a noble concern it is that has seized his unselfish heart! He has forgiven them, and he prays that they may also obtain God's forgiveness. The provoking treatment he had received from them has not made him hard-hearted and bitter but tender-hearted and forgiving. To pass by a wrong done to us is a distinguishing mark of the genuine Christian.

In the second place, this remark of Paul invites a reflection on the fickleness of human friends and admirers, even when they are Christian brethren. The disciples that fled from Gethsemane did not intend to act wickedly; there is a difference between their conduct and that of Judas. They yielded to their baser instincts when they forsook the Lord whom they had truly loved. Perhaps they spent the next two days trying to frame excuses for the disappointment which Jesus had caused them and to justify their action. It is hard, yea, impossible, for human nature to stand by a marked man and share his misfortunes, even when those misfortunes are seen to be inflicted by evil men. The flesh even in Christians dreads martyrdom. God's witnesses for the truth eternal must be prepared to stand alone in their hours of trial, and while maintaining their ground against enemies they must remember their former friends only with sentiments of compassion and thoughts of their spiritual restoration.

Knowing the Gift of God

WEDNESDAY, June 26. John 1:10. "If thou knewest the gift of God." Jesus did not begin His sermon to the woman at the well by denouncing her sinful life. He first won her attention by a request, "Give Me to drink." He knew that merely forbidding sin does not stop the sinning. Driving out Satan's tenants from the heart by resolution or will power, leaving the soul empty, does not change the nature of fallen manhood. Seven other spirits more deadly will come in at the windows after being driven out the door, if the rooms are uninhabited. The soul must have companionship, fellowship, friendship and will be occupied by Christ or Satan.

It is not God's order that His wayward children should become mere negative beings, doing no wrong because their passions have become dulled or killed. Jesus not only rescues man from being the habitation of devils, but transforms his being into a temple of deity, filled with the glories of a new affection of mercy and goodness.

If men could know beforehand who Christ is, and what He does for the soul, they would ask sooner for His salvation. To know Him is to love Him; to love Him is to know Him better evermore. In His arms, the sinner is the saint; the lost is found. The music of earthly pleasures is swallowed up in the sweeter melodies of the new life. The terror of the commandments is quieted by the blessedness of the Beatitudes. In service for others and love for Him, we are too busy to listen to the voices of former tenants.

Having the Son and Having Life

THURSDAY, June 27. I John 5:12. "He that hath the Son hath life; but he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." It is easy to see that life may be lived on any one or on several or on all of various planes. First, there is mere physical life. We say the least that can be said of any human being when we say that he is animate—he is just one degree above vegetation. He breathes and moves. Most men add to this quality of life the power of thought. This is intellectual life, and it may be lived feebly or strongly; we may possess it in small measure or in large. Above this is the plane of moral life. This is the plane on which we exercise faith and hope and love. This is the sphere in which the Christian graces grow. But, as a fruit-tree may bear little fruit or much, imperfect or perfect fruit, so those who are spiritually alive may have that life meagerly or they may have it abundantly.

When the apostle affirms that those who have Jesus Christ have life, he means that they have spiritual life, and that they have it abundantly. Some people have availed themselves of this privilege, and some have not. Those who have not either do not understand what their privileges are or they deliberately reject them. Christian history is full of instances of those who have suddenly confronted the offer of abundant life through Jesus Christ and have availed themselves of it and entered into it. The difference between such lives before they take hold of Christ—take possession of Him, so to speak—and their lives afterwards, is as great as the difference between a tree in February and the same tree in May when it is full of blossoms, or in September when it holds up its ripening fruit to the autumn sun.

Wresting Help from God

FRIDAY, June 28. Ex 33:15. "If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence." The speaker is Moses. He is addressing Jehovah in a very resolute and curt fashion. One must read the entire record of this remarkable interview, to form a proper estimate of the spirit of Moses on this occasion. The exodus had commenced. Canaan had not yet been reached. The Israelites were a homeless people. The people had received signal favors from God, and had listened awed to his sublime revelation from Mount Sinai. Yet they had revolted from God and their leader Moses, causing God to threaten that he would not go up to Canaan with them but conduct them thither by an angel. At this juncture, Moses makes his plea before Jehovah. He brusquely says to God that if God means to quit his people, the whole expedition will come to a stop right then and there. He will not go a step further. What makes the boldness of Moses still more astonishing is the fact that God had already changed his first threat to a promise: He had told Moses that his presence would go with them. Moses fairly seems to warn God to abide by his last statement, or see the whole enterprise come to nought.

Great men of God after Moses have found themselves in similar straits where they had to wrestle with God for a favor. Luther said on a certain occasion that he had cast his business at God's feet and told him that if he would not take care of it, he, Luther, could not do it. And not only great men of affairs in the church but the very humblest Christian.

The Canaanite woman, for instance—must thus deal with God. God loves such earnest souls that seem to wrest his love and benediction from him.

The Human and the Divine

SATURDAY, June 29. Matt. 22:21. "Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and unto God the things which are God's." What are the things that are Caesar's? Where do we draw the line between human and Divine governments? When the individual conscience is invaded by the State, as in the case of the Fugitive Slave Law, or the taxation of the colonies without representation, when a law is contrary to the moral sense of justice; then we must obey God rather than man. Is it not Christianity's mission to make the things of Caesar the things of God, so that the voice of the people will be the voice of God? Our Lord did not endorse here the union of church and State. They are two separate realities which should act in harmony. Christ's kingdom is spiritual and eternal; nationalities are temporary and finite.

When the church has sought to rule in both realms she has become the most despotic of tyrants, invading the domain of individual liberty. Body and soul have been sacked and tortured on the rack and in the flames, while the church has been corrupted and demoralized.

The true mission of the church is to the individual and her great text is, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" Here is a question above all state considerations.

Governments, however, are ordained of God and we are to help uphold the laws of the land, but governments are accountable to the Almighty and He will judge them. Our duty to the civil government is the same as our duty to our neighbor, helping to save nations as well as souls; helping to blot out national evils, redressing wrongs, purifying peoples, making the things of Caesar the things of God, that His will may be done on earth as in heaven, till the kingdoms of men become the kingdoms of the Christ. The Empty Garden

By ETHELWYN HUMPHREY

MRS. AMSDEN stood in her dining-room looking out over her big garden. "It's time I had the rosebushes sprayed again," she mused as she lingered lovingly over the glowing, heavy-headed blossoms. "And I must see about having the asters transplanted into the round bed." The sunshine fell softly into the big, empty garden, flickering through the fruit trees upon the thick turf and blazing gloriously upon the hollyhocks. It was such a pretty garden inside its ivy-covered walls. From the street there was scarcely a suggestion of green except the tops of the fruit trees rounding up above the wall, but inside the gate there was coolness and color and perfume. "Yes, I think it was wise to change the rose arbor; it certainly improves the vista from the house," approved the mistress of the garden.

A sound behind her caused her to turn. At the door, twisting her apron with embarrassment, stood her scrub-woman. Three days a week Mrs. Bent came to help the maid with the heavy work. Three days she came to Mrs. Amsden, and the other three days Mrs. Amsden had found work for her with a neighbor. No one ever thought particularly about Mrs. Bent except as a convenience. Faded and tired, dulled as though life had blurred all her individuality, she was the sort of woman that it is easy to take for granted. Mrs. Amsden wondered what she could possibly want today as she stood twisting her apron in her hands. She hated to see any one so cringing and obsequious, so perhaps she spoke a little brusquely.

"What is it, Mrs. Bent?" "If you please," the woman said. "I've got a little girl. She's quiet, ma'am, she never makes no trouble."

"That's nice for you," said Mrs. Amsden indifferently.

But Mrs. Bent went on. "They say she isn't well, she'll be sick unless she gets out of doors more."

"Why, I am sorry," responded the lady politely, turning back to the window; "but why don't you have her go out more? The fresh air is the best medicine."

Mrs. Bent opened and shut her mouth and moistened her lips. Then she blurted out: "It's the garden, ma'am, it's so big and sunny, and it's empty most times. She wouldn't make any trouble at all, she's that quiet now."

"What!" exclaimed Mrs. Amsden sharply, comprehending at last. "Bring a child into my garden?"

"Just the sunny days when she wouldn't be no bother," mumbled the woman in her frightened voice.

"A child in my garden!" repeated the outraged owner. "Impossible! I couldn't have a child there."

Mrs. Bent untwisted her apron and began to back out of the room. "Yes'm, yes'm, all right, ma'am. But she wouldn't race much, she's quiet-like, and the garden's empty most times." But before she had finished her plea she had slipped through the door and fled back to her laundry.

"A child in my garden!" Mrs. Amsden protested to herself. "The woman must be crazy!" She shrugged her shoulders, then with her scissors and her basket she went out to gather roses. But her irritation followed her as she clipped the tall stems. "Why in the world did I promise Mrs. Thornton that I would go with her this afternoon? I am afraid I don't feel philanthropic. People catch dreadful diseases or get held up or knocked down when they go into such places." Snip went the scissors, and the basket filled with damask petals curling back from the opening buds. But one needs a heart at rest to enjoy beauty, and Mrs. Amsden's irritation still lingered. "Where did she say she was going? Some nursery where women leave their children when they go out to work. Well, why don't they stay at home and take care of their own children? A woman's place is in the home." A thorn stuck viciously into her finger. She wished she didn't feel so cross, it made her hot and uncomfortable. But

At last Mrs. Thornton said: "You see, this is the sort of place they live in," and Mrs. Amsden looked involuntarily. In that glance a sudden, vivid impression of a narrow cleft between brick walls cobwebbed full of clotheslines and fire escapes etched itself upon her brain. She shivered a little and said, "How dreadful!" as the motor whirled them past. Presently the car drew up at the sidewalk before a cheerful door, and as they stepped inside Mrs. Amsden heard child laughter echoing through the corridors.

In another moment she stood at the threshold of a big, sunny room filled with children. At first they seemed to Mrs. Amsden a formless tangle, like bees swarming on a honeycomb; but Amsden sat down in the chair that the matron had brought her and drew her skirts about her.

"Isn't he a darling!" exclaimed Mrs. Thornton.

"Yes," agreed Mrs. Amsden a little doubtfully, and then she exclaimed: "But babies ought to have pretty things. It is dreadful for children to wear ugly, faded clothes."

Mrs. Thornton laughed a little. "Wouldn't it be fun to dress them up like the babies in the store windows? But then," she added cheerfully, "probably it wouldn't be good for them if we could. And there are things they need so much more," she said as her face sobered. "And now I've got to meet the director for a little conference. You won't mind staying and playing with the children, will you?"

Mrs. Amsden smiled a little wanly. She wondered how one played with these slum babies. After a few minutes the novelty of having a lady sit in the doorway wore off, and the children went about their occupations once more. Mary Rosenberg was building a tower of blocks that Dora Verger deftly knocked down at the moment of completion. Angelo was chasing a parti-colored ball, and Marcelle was nursing a doll which had long since dispensed with the superfluity of hair. Mrs. Amsden became aware of one child who stood against the wall near her and stared, stared as though the soul of her was being drawn out of her shining eyes. The girl made her uneasy. "What is it?" she asked a little abruptly.

The child started and hung her head, while one finger went into her mouth. "What is it?" repeated Mrs. Amsden more gently.

"I don't know," she answered. "It looks like a rose, but it smells like frankincense and myrrh."

"Like what?" queried Mrs. Amsden.

"Like the frankincense and myrrh that they brought to Jesus when he was a baby." And she added, as the strange lady continued to look at her blankly, "My teacher said so at Sunday school."

"Don't you know what roses smell like?" asked the lady after a pause.

"I know what they look like, because I've seen them in the store windows; but you can't smell them through the glass."

"This rose didn't come from a store," Mrs. Amsden said, looking down at the flower. Then she asked, "Didn't you ever see a garden?"

The girl shook her head.

"Didn't you ever see a place where trees and flowers grow, and where there are big bushes covered with blossoms?"

"Like the park?"

"Yes," agreed the visitor slowly, "only different, because—because—"

How should she make her understand what a garden meant? She tried again. "Different because it's all your own. You plant the flowers and watch them every day and give them water and help them to grow."

"Oh, I know!" exclaimed the child brightening. "It's like the geranium I had last Easter. It had a pink blossom on it, and the lady at the settlement told me to give it water to drink, and I did, and two leaves grew on it."

"Yes, that's just it; that's what a garden is, only there are lots and lots of plants and flowers."

"If you please, I've got a little girl" when her friend called for her a few hours later she found her charming and gracious in her fresh, pretty gown with a dusky rose at her girdle.

Down through the city they rode, past the park with its fountains, past the shops on the avenue with their finery. With a lurch the car turned a corner, and the smooth asphalt gave way to rough, uneven pavement. Mrs. Amsden talked brightly with her friend. She tried not to look about her. She did not want to see dirt and wretchedness. What had she, fresh from her glowing rose garden, to do with squalor?

presently they began to take on individuality. There were toddlers with aureoles of golden hair, and there were children whose swarthy faces and lustrous eyes proclaimed kinship with sunnier skies. The visitor stood looking curiously upon the varied types of childhood. She found, a little to her surprise, that her beauty-seeking eye lingered approvingly upon some of the child faces. "What wonderful pansy eyes!" she said to herself as a baby creeping at her feet gazed at the stranger. Mrs. Thornton picked up the baby and gave him a devouring hug, but Mrs.

"But my geranium got yellow and died."

"That was too bad," answered Mrs. Amsden, her gardener's instinct thoroughly aroused. "Perhaps you didn't give it water enough."

"Mother said flowers need sunshine and air," the little one corrected gravely.

Sunshine and air! Mrs. Amsden stopped short. Suddenly the remembrance of that crowded alley, dark and chill, with its cobwebbed clothes-lines, flashed over her. Of course the geranium died! How did children live where geraniums died? Slowly she unfastened the rose from her girdle. Frankincense and myrrh! Roses and the baby Jesus! How the words echoed in her head—roses and the baby Jesus! "Here, child," she said coaxingly, holding out her hand, "don't you want the rose?"

She took it shyly, and backed against her wall again with rapt face, and eyes that saw nothing except the wonder of the unfolding petals. "And it is only one rose," Mrs. Amsden said to herself as she watched the delight on the sensitive face. She laid her hand gently upon the child's shoulder, but she started back. "Why," she said to the matron who came bustling past just then, "how thin the child is! Her bones stick out like—like rocks in a garden."

"Yes," answered the matron a little sadly, "Beatrice needs to get out of doors. You see, we haven't any open-air playground here, and the summer is hard. Beatrice was sick last spring, and she has never gotten her strength back. I told her mother the other day that she ought to be gotten out of doors more, but what can you do?" The matron shrugged her shoulders helplessly and picked up the littlest baby and gave him a drink of milk.

"But what did her mother say?" questioned Mrs. Amsden.

"Oh, poor soul! She cried and broke her heart, but what could she do?"

"But why couldn't she take her on trips to the parks or to the shore or somewhere?" she ended vaguely.

"Why, bless your heart, the woman works all day long to keep the breath of life in the two of them. You see, her husband died two years ago, and she has been struggling ever since. They get along with our help, but"—the matron's eye fell upon the rose in the child's hand—"children are like flowers; they need air and sunshine as well as food."

Mrs. Amsden's heart sank as the vision of that chill, dark alley where geraniums died came over her once more. "But isn't there any place for her? There is such a lot of air and sunshine in the world, so many fields of grass, and so many green trees." Mrs.

Amsden stopped short and caught her breath; then she added, "and so many empty gardens!"

But the matron had no time for speculation. Concrete facts were her material, and Teresa had just fallen from a bench she was trying to climb.

Mrs. Thornton was delayed longer than she had expected. The hands of the clock passed five and moved on toward the half-hour. A Syrian father stopped on his way home from work for his round-cheeked baby. An Irish woman came, and with many blandishing endearments for the matron claimed Patsy. Up the corridor a woman came wearily. Beatrice darted away from her corner and threw her arms about the newcomer. "Mother, mother!" she cried. "See what the lady gave me!"

The mother stooped and buried her face in the child's soft neck. Some familiar recollection stirred in Mrs. Amsden at the sight of that bowed figure. She turned quickly to the matron. "But who is she?"

"The mother? Why, just a poor, sweet, little woman who is having a hard time."

"I know; but her name?"

By this time the woman had straightened up. "See my rose," the child was crying; "the lady gave it to me, and it has a smell like—"

But nobody was listening to her. The two women were staring into each other's faces. Mrs. Bent's face worked nervously, but Mrs. Amsden's social training came to her rescue. Social training to the rescue, with one's scrub-woman! She knew now why the pathetic curve of those shoulders was so familiar as the woman had leaned over the child. "Why, Mrs. Bent!" she exclaimed, and once more she was the gracious lady, "is Beatrice your little girl? I didn't know. And, Mrs. Bent, won't you bring Beatrice with you when you come tomorrow? I'd love to see her playing among the roses. You see, I didn't know."

A light flashed into Mrs. Bent's eyes that spoke the joy and relief of her burdened heart; as she went down the corridor with Beatrice clinging to her hand she walked as though she were not so tired as she had been when she came. Mrs. Amsden watched the woman and child out of sight. "Oh," she exclaimed to the matron as the door closed upon them, "what do you think? She works for me, and she asked me only this morning if she might bring her little girl to play in the garden, and I refused her!"

"Yes, I understand," answered the matron quietly. "You didn't know."

"No, I didn't know. But think! she might have died for want of the fresh air of my empty garden, and I'd never have known—"

Pastor Fetler's Prayer Tower

REVEREND E. W. OLSON, a Swedish evangelist, writes this interesting account of a recent visit to Pastor William Fetler's Russian Bible Institute in Philadelphia:

"I have just visited the Russian Bible Institute in Philadelphia. I had heard much of this enterprise, but did not realize to what proportions it had grown in less than a year. It is the Lord's doings, and it is wonderful in our eyes."

"The school buildings are four in number. The school has accommodation for 150 students. There are eighty-five brothers and fifteen sisters who to join the school have given up well paid situations, and now, without promise of any salary, are devoting their time to preparation for a self-denying life in the service of the Lord. Most of the students came originally from Russia, though some were born in this country. The instruction compares favorably with that given in other similar schools. The regular yearly course covers nine months. The Normal Course requires three years. As soon as the way opens, several of these men will be sent for Gospel work to Russia. Of course, the Bible is given the first place in the curriculum, and the Russians not only study the Bible, but they commit many portions of it to memory. Happy are those people who fill their hearts with the Word of God!

"The school has a 'prayer tower' above the fourth story of the main building. The small room was formerly used as an observatory. Some one is always praying there, both night and day. It happened that one evening I made an inspection of the tower. It was past midnight when I reached the top. I found in the tower one of those Russian brethren prostrate on his face, absorbed in fervent prayer for the school, and for the salvation of his own countrymen. I felt it to be a holy place; a place where God surely dwelt."

"The teachers of the school are twelve in number, six Russians and six Americans, talented, learned and God-fearing. They are present at the prayer meetings, and lead the students into a deeper spiritual life. This school has met confidence and good-will from all who love God's work, and who see in it a unique opportunity to reach the masses of Russia through these Russian brethren."

Just now Pastor Fetler is making a great effort to raise a fund to pay part of the mortgage, and for repairs to the buildings. Any readers of this journal wishing to aid him in his work can do so by sending their contributions to the Christian Herald.

Women who deplore even a hint of grease on glassware generally use something exceptional, like Gold Dust.

And, nowadays, who is not thankful for added moments away from the sink?

For very, very fresh dishtowels—for an immaculate sink with sterilized drain pipe—for a sweet, sanitary refrigerator—for cheerfully clean floors—for a gleaming clean bath-tub, be sure it is really Gold Dust you use.

Lemon Juice vs. Vinegar

Note the Result in This Tasty Salad Dressing

WE print below a recipe for a popular salad dressing. It is made with lemon juice instead of vinegar. Try it; then send for nine others, equally delicious.

You will probably never again use vinegar in dressings once you try the "witching drop of lemon juice." Practically all famous chefs have discarded vinegar because lemon juice gives a more exquisite flavor. Learn for yourself what these chefs have proved. Send now for the recipes.

All of these dressings are easy to make and they are wholesome and pure as well as appetizing and delicious.

Try dressings both ways—the old way and the new. Then decide which is the better.

FRENCH DRESSING

1/2 teaspoon salt 1/4 teaspoon paprika 4 tablespoons oil
2 tablespoons Sunkist lemon juice.

Mix ingredients in order given and stir or shake thoroughly just before serving. A half-pint glass jar, with screw top, or a French dressing bottle are best for mixing.

Always see that you get California lemons. They are clean and bright, juicy, tart and practically seedless. All first class dealers sell them.

WHAT KIND OF A MAN ARE YOU?

You young man? Are you prepared to meet face to face what life has in store for you and make a success of it, or are you going to fall in behind with the physical and mental weaklings who never get anywhere? Rarely, if ever, has a man succeeded in life without health. You will find physical weakness by the wayside of life suffering for their early mistakes and errors. There is a reason for this.

I AM A BUILDER OF MEN

Make it re-builder if you like—the results are the same because they are based on a system which has taken a lifetime to study out and perfect. I, personally, am the result of that system. I experimented first with myself, because I wanted to be sure. Then I tried it on others with the same marvelous results. I have never had a failure among the many thousands who have placed themselves in my hands. I annihilate physical ills, and in many cases, mental ills. There are no drugs in my prescription. "Throw physics to the dogs." If ever there was a royal road to health, strength, energy and vitality, it is that known as the Strongfort System by which each pupil receives individual instructions.

Are You Interested in Yourself?

Have you made a mistake at some time in your life as a result of which you are now suffering and paying the penalty? What are you going to do about it? Do you know that I can help you and will? In all earnestness and sincerity I beg of you to.

LET ME RE-BUILD YOU

There is a liberal education in my book, "Promotion and Conservation of Health, Strength and Mental Energy." It is FREE. Send for it today and include three 2c stamps to cover mailing expenses.

Jesus Christ, Our Redeemer and Lord

International Sunday School Lesson for June 30. A Review of the Gospel of Mark

By REV. GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

FOR six months now we have been studying, chapter by chapter, the Gospel according to Mark, and I trust we have omitted no single sentence even of this record, which many thoughtful men regard as the basis of all other accounts of Christ's life. What has been the total impression of our work upon our minds and our hearts?

The outline of Mark is simple. He had slight interest in anything preceding the public ministry, the beginning of which was to him "the beginning of the Gospel." He traces plainly for us the growing popularity of Jesus, which He met by an attitude of reserve and even discouragement. Then Mark describes for us the growing hostility of the religious leaders of Israel, which Jesus met by a quiet disregard of even the most precious of their petty ritualistic requirements. As our author interweaves these two tendencies of popularity and hatred, he brings us to the turning-point at the Transfiguration, and portrays Jesus laboring with the chosen twelve to cleanse them of self-seeking, and to convince them that the Messiah's path is the Way of the Cross. Mark soon goes on to the Jerusalem journey and the Last Week, with its incidents in and around the Holy City.

Mark's book has been well called "The Public Acts of the Mighty Worker," and his purpose seems plain to let these deeds speak for themselves, making their impression on new readers as they did upon those eye-witnesses in the days of His flesh. Mark's Gospel is a masterpiece of direct testimony, without side issues, with little theology, no argument and scarcely a personal creed. He only stands steadfastly by, showing men their Lord and Master, and narrating his brief, striking, tragic career.

The Teachings of Christ in Mark

There is no bulky collection of straight teachings in Mark, such as Matthew has, in the Sermon on the Mount for example. There are very few of those wonderful parables of our Saviour, of which Luke has preserved the best and left us forever indebted to him. But rather remarkably, little by little, he reveals the teachings of Jesus as a growing system called forth by the varying circumstances and needs of his hearers as He goes about his work among them.

Mark seemed to feel that he could show Jesus' career, but was hardly able to do justice to the subtle majesty of His claims and spiritual teachings. But he has succeeded in really letting these things shine forth of themselves. Mark's Jesus is not one whit less majestic than John's, for all Mark's simplicity and meagerness of statement. We have been reading about One who came into the world of men with the deliberate purpose of conquering their allegiance by love and grace; who would not accept any external homage nor any temporal kingdom, but was determined so to live and so to die that the souls of men would hail Him as their Captain, their Redeemer and the Goal of their Ambition. He seemed to know he would be first rejected and slain, but he was calmly sure that eventually he would be acknowledged and enthroned in the hearts of humanity.

That is why He was glad to be called "teacher" and "prophet," but did not like to be called "a worker of miracles" or a "king." His true ambition was to be King of an unworldly kingdom, to reign in the inner sanctuaries where conscience and reverence dwell. The early church caught something of the vision of Christ when they bestowed upon Him two universal titles, Shepherd and King. His shepherding shows the unworldliness of his kingdom. He would have liked the title King had it meant spiritual obedience. He rejected it when it meant selfish ambition trying to use his royal qualities as a shield.

This Jesus of Mark's Gospel loved to deal with individuals, respecting their integrity and personality, longing to help them, piercing through the veneers and shams to the sources of real character beneath. He was very direct, yet ever considerate. Only the hypocrite aroused his sarcasm and scorn. He was kind toward the burdened and perplexed.

More than half of our recent lessons have to do with these contacts with individual lives. They are transfigured, uplifted, set free from burdens and sins; or they are revealed as essentially unworthy of the precious privileges of the Kingdom. Some become saints indeed; others turn away sorrowful, or spiteful, preferring the temporary gains of this world to fellowship with the Eternal. The past six months have brought before us a gallery of portraits drawn from life, of men and women of Galilee and Judea in the first century, whose counterparts are with us yet wherever we may be. Mark's story shows the challenge of Jesus Christ coming home to every individual soul.

The Gospel and Society

But almost every problem brought out by these individual contacts is a social problem! Our religion deals with individuals but not apart from their social relations. They are finally judged, not alone, but by their attitude toward others. The essential sin dealt with is selfishness, the essential grace taught is love; neither word can be properly applied to isolated hermit spirits. The one breaks down society and makes life miserable, the other makes society possible and life divine. It is actually true that judgment is always social, inasmuch as we have done or not done what is right unto even the least of our brothers. Jesus condemned the Scribes and Pharisees, not because they rejected him as Messiah, but because their lives were inconsistent and harmful toward those who were committed into their care.

What the Gospel Is

How many definitions we have had of that fine old Anglo-Saxon word "Gospel"! If we translate with the Revisers, "good news," we will not put into it some of the artificial and unreal elements which have hidden its meaning. The "good news" is more than the revelation of God's will by Christ. It is the revelation of God's character in Christ, whereby we know that God loves us and that he is seeking to lend us his aid in realizing his will and attaining true righteousness. So, at least, Mark seems to present the essence of the Gospel to me. Christ came proclaiming the glad tidings of the coming of the Kingdom of God upon earth, the reign of truth and brotherhood and service, which should be achieved by repentance and struggle, through the help of the Father of our spirits.

But while the elements of the Gospel are thus simple, our human life is so complex, its social and mental adjustments so continuous, that the following of Christ is no trifling thing. It still means many a sacrifice. It still means frequent searching of the heart and subduing of the will. It still calls for patient thought and intelligent study to meet the complex situation of modern life and duty. Take for instance the case of a new missionary going out to India. We know well the essential purposes of his mission. But what need for acquaintance with the very language and customs of the tribes and castes, before any readjustment to the basis of Christ can be successfully advocated!

With these thoughts as to the very practical social implications of the Gospel and their far-reaching interrelations in our present life, we leave our survey of Mark. But during the next quarter, it is to be our duty and privilege to take up a series of Studies in the Christian Life, where the principles brought out by Mark are illustrated from various parts of the Bible.

The Patriotic Potato and a Few Other Things

AS is our wont, we set upon our weekly issue of the Corner the stamp of the great corporation under which and with which we are proud and happy to labor. This is the slogan for today:

Potatoes and Patriotism

Every potato in the land is crying to be eaten, crying to be allowed to save wheat. Satisfy your hunger with potatoes!

[SIGNED]

UNITED STATES FOOD ADMINISTRATION.

Except, perhaps, during the great famine in Ireland nearly three-quarters of a century ago the potato has never played so important a part in the dietary of the world as just now. There are numberless ways of cooking it, many of which are unknown to the average housewife. In one cook-book, taken at random from my shelves since beginning this paragraph, I have counted no less than fifty-six recipes under the head of "potatoes." We hope to select enough novel and tempting methods to reconcile the reader who hankers obstinately after wheat breads, to compliance with the official order given above.

Before settling down to the chief business of the hour, it is but courteous that we should notice a communication just received. It bears, as will be seen, the sign of the "wireless" token of haste and emergency, explained by the contents of the "dispatch."

Please take pity upon a young housewife who is in sore perplexity. My John is a Scotchman, and, as is the habit of his race, somewhat "set in his ways." He is very fond of Scotch broth. As he says, "when it is well made, a good plateful is a dinner in itself." I cannot make it to suit him without seasoning it well with meat. And meat is frightfully dear! It is sheer extravagance to buy, we will say, a piece of corned beef weighing three pounds just to make stock for the broth. The same may be said of mutton. Will you give me a recipe for the genuine Scotch broth made without meat—if there is such a thing. Or tell me of some economical way of making a savory stock for it?

HELEN B., Ohio.

Other frugal housewives have made a similar request. I am glad to be able to gratify you all, and especially pleased to provide your John with the savory dish which the Scotchman's soul loveth, without making his meat bills heavy.

Scotch Broth

Open a half-pint can of a good brand of soup, which ranges in price from ten to twelve cents. Empty it, refill it with hot water to rinse out every drop of nourishment, and add to the soup. Set aside to cool and to rid it of the close taste of canned foods, while you prepare the vegetables. Peel and cut into small dice one large carrot, one turnip, two onions, two stalks of celery, and parboil them for ten minutes. Drain off the water and add to the parboiled vegetables half a can of green peas and a cupful of pearl barley which has been soaked in tepid water three or four hours. Mix all well, adding a tablespoonful of chopped parsley, and put into your soup-kettle with the soup-stock from the can. Simmer slowly for three hours. Have ready a roux made by cooking together in a frying-pan a tablespoonful of butter and one of flour. Mix with this a little of the soup to thin it before stirring it into the kettle. Boil for three minutes and serve. Should the stock not season the broth to your taste, add pepper and salt at the last boiling. If John does not wish to have his broth very "thick and slab," a little boiling water stirred in just before pouring it into the tureen will bring it all right.

Baked Potatoes

This is the most primitive way of preparing the famous tuber for the table. Everybody has heard the time-worn anecdote of the Irishman who had but one fault to find with a big baked potato, and that was that there were not always two of them. The wise cook could name other defects. As surely as "wit goes to the boiling of eggs," intelligence and delicate manipulation enter into the task of baking our potato aright.

New potatoes—even Bermudas—should never be cooked in this way.

Select ripe, full-grown and sound potatoes of uniform size, wash and wipe them dry, and with the finger-tips rub into the skin enough lard or dripping to coat it all over, not thickly but evenly. Bake in a steady oven until the largest yields to the pressure of your thumb and finger. Serve, wrapped in a hot napkin. Before breaking one open, knead it deftly with your fingers to make it mealy throughout. Never cut a baked potato. It makes it "soggy." You will find that the oiled skin may be stripped from the mealy interior like so much tissue-paper, taking nothing with it.

Boiled Potatoes au Naturel

Here, too, select those of uniform size. Wash and drop into boiling water slightly salted, and cook fast until a fork will pierce the largest easily. Drain off the water, throwing in a handful of dry salt, and set the uncovered pot at the back of the range to "dry off" the potatoes. Serve in their jackets as soon as they are perfectly dry.

Baked Potatoes on the Half Shell

Bake as already directed (but without greasing the skins), choosing large, smooth potatoes of uniform size and shape. When they are done, halve each lengthwise with a sharp knife and scrape out the contents, taking care not to tear the skins. Mash what you have taken out to a cream with melted butter and hot milk, season with pepper and salt and refill the skins, rounding the mashed potato on top. Put a dot of butter upon each, and brown lightly upon the upper grating of the oven.

Potatoes à la Reine

Mash enough boiled potatoes to make two cupfuls. Heat the bowl in which this is done and keep it hot by setting in a pan of boiling water. Beat the yolk of an egg very light and add to it a tablespoonful of melted butter and one of hot cream. Stir, and beat the mixture into the potato, and when ingredients are thoroughly amalgamated turn out upon a floured pastry-board and roll into a sheet a little more than half-an-inch thick. With a biscuit-cutter cut into rounds; slip a cake-turner under each and transfer to a greased baking-pan. Leave upon the ice for an hour before sprinkling with grated Parmesan cheese. Bake, then, in a quick oven to a light brown. Serve at once. As a side-dish at luncheon, you will find these "to the queen's taste."

Potatoes au Gratin

Paro the potatoes and slice evenly and thin. Arrange in a greased bake-dish, sprinkling the layers with salt, pepper and tiny bits of butter. When all are in, pour in a cupful of hot milk and cover the uppermost layer with fine cracker-crumbs, seasoned with salt and pepper and dotted with butter. Bake, covered, for half an hour, then brown, lightly.

"Fanny's Freak"

This is a nice Lenten luncheon dish. Boil and mash soft twelve fine potatoes, or enough to make a quart when mashed. Work to a smooth mass with hot milk and butter and salt and pepper to taste. Whip light and make into a flat-topped mountain in the center of a fire-proof platter. Smooth the sides of the hillock with a broad-bladed knife, and then carefully dig out a cupful of potato from the center. Wash the mountain all over, including the "crater," with white of egg and set in the oven to heat and brown delicately. While this is going on, make a sauce of a cupful of milk, into which stir a pinch of soda, season with salt, pepper and a teaspoonful of onion-juice, and thicken with a roux made by cooking together in a frying-pan a tablespoonful of butter and one of flour. Cook one minute before adding three tablespoonfuls of grated cheese. When the hillock is heated and browned, sprinkle all over with fine crumbs; fill the cavity with the hot sauce, and leave in the oven three minutes before serving. If properly made, our "Fanny's freak" leaves little room for regret that it takes the place of honor upon a meatless day.

"Give him a cold potato!" has passed into a proverb of heartless sarcasm, since Rip Van Winkle taught it to his generation. Next week we will reason together of ways of ridding the cold potato of a bad name.

By some means a line was omitted from the recipe for "Rye 'n Injun Bread" in our issue of May 29. There should be added to ingredients for making the Potato Sponge, which is to "raise" the dough—"half a cake of compressed yeast, dissolved in four tablespoonfuls of warm water."

When Shadows Fall Westward

That is, in the morning—let a dish of some Puffed Grain greet your folks at breakfast.

If you serve berries, mix the puffed grains with them. Or serve like any cereal. There is no other way even half so delightful for serving Rice, Wheat or Corn.

These are bubble grains, puffed by steam explosion to eight times former size. They are thin and flimsy, crisp and toasted, and they have a nut-like flavor.

They seem like breakfast confections. Yet they are grain foods—two of them whole grains. Every food cell has been blasted so they easily digest.

These are the ideal foods, the desired foods. Start every summer day with one of them.

Three Bubble Grains
Puffed Puffed Corn
Rice Wheat Puffs
Each 15c Except in Far West

When Shadows Fall Eastward

At supper-time or children's bedtime, serve some Puffed Grain in a bowl of milk.

Here are airy, toasted morsels, vastly better than the best of bread or crackers.

In Puffed Rice or Puffed Wheat you get the whole grains. In Corn Puffs you get hominy puffed. In all you get scientific foods, made by Prof. Anderson's process. Every granule is broken so that every atom feeds.

Then scatter these flaky, flavory grains on your dishes of ice cream. Use them in your soups. Crisp and lightly butter for children to eat like peanuts when at play.

Puffed Grains are all-day foods in homes where children get what they like best.

Keep all three kinds on hand.

Questions and Answers

E. F. W., Kitchener, Ont. 1. Mr. Moody, the great evangelist, was once asked whether he regarded the Bible as inspired, and his answer was brief and to the point: "I know the Bible is inspired because it inspires me." The Bible bears within itself the evidence of inspiration, and wherever it is known and read, and its precepts followed, its influence is uplifting and inspiring. The authenticity of the Bible is being proved by old records or monuments, by tablets recently deciphered, and by discoveries in Bible lands. No book was ever more violently attacked, no book was ever more misused, yet it has survived the attacks of foes and the faults of friends and is read today more widely than ever. 2. Yes; saving faith is a gift of God to the penitent sinner. He calls us with a holy calling out of darkness into his marvelous light, and by his power he keeps us through faith unto salvation (See II Tim. 1:9; I Pet. 2:9; 1:3). 3. In John 14:30 Jesus says that there is an absolute barrier between the prince of this world and himself. Neither in the person nor in the work of the Redeemer has he any interest. He had deliberately opposed, denied and rejected the truth; therefore he has now nothing to do with it, except as its malevolent opponent, and as the misleader and tempter of men.

Mrs. W. S. W. The Jews, as a class and race, are noted for their extreme filial affection. They take the best of care and make the best of provision for their aged parents and other relatives.

D. T. F., Bloomfield, N. J. The Bible translation was mainly done during Luther's imprisonment in the Wartburg. He had no collaboration. At times, however, he took counsel with his friends as the work progressed. The New Testament was almost wholly his own. When technical knowledge was necessary, Luther consulted Melancthon, Spalatin, Justus Jonas, and several rabbis who met at his house once a week when he lived at Wittenberg. Their assistance related chiefly to the Old Testament, which appeared first, September 21, 1534.

Mrs. E. P., Vermont. Please explain the apparent discrepancy between Joshua 11:21-23 and Joshua 14:12 and 15:14. We have no details except those given in the Bible. In Joshua 11:22, three places are mentioned in which the Anakim remained. As Caleb found Anakim on the mountain later, why is it not reasonable to suppose that some of those living in the three places mentioned removed to the mountains to fill the places of those who had been killed?

E. C., Belfast, Me. Wars, earthquakes, fires and changes on the earth's surface have covered up many ancient cities. Jerusalem has been repeatedly rebuilt after suffering from many sieges and earthquakes. The greatest destruction was that committed by the Romans in 70 A.D., when the order was given to raze the entire city, and this was done, only a single tower being left standing. Similar causes have operated to obliterate great cities in Greece, Asia Minor, Babylonia and Persia. In Egypt, the shifting of desert sands and the change of the bed of the Nile have resulted in the covering up of once famous cities.

R. A. C., Ontario, Ore. The Lincoln Highway starts at New York and goes through Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Chicago, Omaha, Cheyenne, Salt Lake City, Reno, Oakland, and ends at San Francisco. A road called the Pacific Highway goes north from San Francisco, through Oregon and Washington.

Mrs. J. M. R., Lipscomb, Texas. Your question must be answered by a reference to the context of the verses you find difficult. In the preceding passages (Matt. 7), the Lord has given an exposition of the requirements respectively of the law and the prophets, and had shown them far beyond the low morality of the Scribes and Pharisees. He had shown that men might easily be tempted, by their own wicked, case-loving hearts, to follow the easier, broader way than that narrow one traveled by those who had repentance, faith, humility, self-denial and poverty in spirit. It is not God that makes the path to destruction wide, but the great number that travel upon it. It is not God that keeps the path of virtue narrow and the gate small, but the small number that attempt to find it and who are fully accommodated by its small confines. God wants all to find the narrow path that leads to eternal bliss, but those who will not follow that path, but rather choose the highway of destruction, are sufficiently warned of the consequences.

Subscriber, La Porte, Ind. The United States leads the world in automobiles. There are now in the United States 4,842,139 registered motor vehicles of all kinds, including 435,000 motor trucks. This is about the proportion of one car to every 24 persons. All other countries, according to last year's statistics, had 719,246 motor vehicles, Europe having 437,558, Canada 118,086, South America 39,188, Australia, Asia and Oceania 55,240.

Reader, Paterson, N. J. War bread is not a new thing; very far from it. Rev. Howard B. Grose, of the U. S. Food Administration, points out the fact that the children of Israel, when they defended Jerusalem against siege, were advised by Ezekiel to utilize every possible means of supplementing their wheat supply. That was 2,400 years ago. Ezekiel 4:9 tells us how the prophet said to the defenders of the city: "Take thou also unto thee wheat, and barley, and beans, and lentils, and millet, and fitches, and put them in one vessel, and make thee bread thereof, according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie upon thy side, three hundred and ninety days shalt thou eat thereof." His instructions were in effect that during the siege they were no longer to be able to make the bread with pure wheat, but would have to mix it with all kinds of grain and vegetables, which are not ordinarily utilized in making flour, except in times of extreme need. Ezekiel, Dr. Grose remarks, really furnished a recipe for war bread, which is pretty nearly the oldest instance of the kind the world knows of.

Any farmer in the New England or Middle States, who could use the services on his farm of a young man with slightly defective eyesight, who will work for his room and board, can learn particulars by dropping a note to F. W. S., Christian Herald.

Anxious, Polo, Ill. You do not tell us what the evil habit is you are fighting, so it is difficult to advise. But whatever it is, God will help you overcome, if you strive sincerely. You know enough of yourself to be aware that there are predisposing causes which you should avoid. A great help is to keep the mind actively employed. Take up some study or occupation that will interest you and occupy your thoughts. When you feel the temptation approaching, get to some absorbing employment. Do your utmost, relying on God for the power he gives to those who need it and ask for it.

L. O. H., Weltonville, N. Y. When a person is conscious of hating sin, when he enjoys the society of Christians, rejoices over the conversion of sinners and earnestly seeks to live as Christ would have him live, such a change has taken place within him as the new birth produces. In some cases the change is gradual, in others almost immediate. The memory of past sin is, of course, present, and while it should lead to humility, it should never be an obstacle to Christian endeavor. One who has recovered from a sinful condition is oftentimes peculiarly fitted to rescue others, because he knows their needs and can help them effectively.

Edith, Little Rock, Ark. Please explain Rom. 9:18.

Resistance to the goodness of God has inevitably a hardening effect. God hardens no man's heart; the man hardens it himself, by trusting always to escape punishment because he has succeeded in doing so heretofore. Paul's words seem to carry the meaning; but by comparing the context in the previous and succeeding chapters, it will be seen that he is quoting objections to his arguments for the sake of answering them.

R. S. E., Germantown, Pa. The Hebrew tongue is not in common use today. It is, of course, used in the Jewish synagogue as an ecclesiastical language, when the law and the prophets and the Psalms are read in Hebrew, but only educated Jews understand it. The uneducated Jews use Yiddish, a conglomerate or corrupt form of German. In Christ's time the common people spoke Aramaic, and the natural inference from Neh. 8:8 is that even at the time of the return from the Exile, many of the Jews were not familiar with the ancient language. The men appointed to read the Scriptures were obliged "to give the sense, in order that the hearers might understand what was read to them."

L. E. C., Middletown, Conn. There is no mystery whatever in our finding the account of II Kings 19 in Isaiah 37. Many modern documents are repeated in modern books. Lincoln's speeches would naturally appear in a history of the Civil War, in his own biography and in many other books of the period and of other periods. As is not improbable, the account of Hezekiah's healing was written by Isaiah, and the person who wrote the Kings may have secured a copy of it for reproduction in his book.

B. F. M., Union City, Tenn. Please explain discrepancies between II Kings 24:8 and II Chron. 36:9.

It is claimed by some that Jehoiaquim was associated in the government with his father for a period of ten years before his death, and that the writer in Kings gives the time when he began to reign alone after his father's death. There is a more likely explanation, however, namely, that some early copyist of Chronicles mistook the Hebrew letter eighteen for eight, which may easily be done. Succeeding writers would do the same in copying from him, and thus continue the mistake. Before the age of printing, when the only copies of books were those written by hand, an error of that kind might easily be made and perpetuated.

DRIVING A BARGAIN

In Oriental bazaars prices are several times what the merchant is willing to take. The one-price standard is unknown.

Driving a good bargain depends on how expert a judge of values you are—or on how persistently you haggle.

We might be doing business on lines no more advanced than the Turk or Chinaman were it not for advertising.

Advertising protects the buyer, standardizes quality, stabilizes price. It enables you, without haggling, without knowledge of values, to drive as good a bargain as any other.

Manufacturers who advertise must live up to printed claims or no amount of advertising would sell their goods.

Goods advertised in CHRISTIAN HERALD have not only this backing of the maker but the backing of CHRISTIAN HERALD as well—a twofold sponsorship, a twofold responsibility, protecting you.

"That Letter to Him"

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT was a letter from a boy in the trenches—a boy who had been a good friend of mine before ever he became a soldier—that showed me the light. It went this way:

"It will be June when this reaches you, and I'm wondering whether the Big City has changed—or whether it's the same old place. I'm wondering whether they are selling pink roses now on every street corner, and what sort of hats the girls who stroll along Fifth Avenue are wearing. I'm wondering how the side window of Brentano's is decorated (remember how you used to watch it for changes?) and what song New York is singing. I'm wondering if you've had fresh green peas yet for dinner, and strawberries—" So ran the letter from the boy in the trenches—the boy who had been a very good friend before ever he was a soldier.

I reckon that since the beginning of the war I've written quite an uncountable number of letters to the boys who are wearing the uniform of our country. So has pretty nearly every woman in these United States—for very few women there are who haven't found that the war is a personal thing to them. But it wasn't until I read the letter I have quoted in part, that I began to realize that perhaps my letters weren't quite the right sort.

The answer I sent back to the boy in the trenches was a fairly gay one. In it I told of the magnolia tree that was all abloom in a certain yard in the vicinity of Washington Square, of the odd little near-military bonnets the girls on Fifth Avenue were affecting. I told of numerous window decorations in one paragraph, and commented in the next on a certain dreamy little song that all the city seems to be humming under its breath. And I wished that he could eat some of our strawberry shortcake, and assured him he would—this time next year.

I THINK a good many women are laboring under the delusion that letters to our soldiers must be grim—or if not grim, at least rather solemn—affairs. They feel that the boy who is in training camp here or who is in a trench over seas must be commiserated with, and praised, and too obviously encouraged. Many go into long dissertations on the horrors of the battlefield, and wonder quite piteously, when the fighting will be done with. They forget that the boys, despite extraordinary conditions, are the same boys who not long ago were interested in baseball scores, and church socials, and new suits, and college educations.

"The letters my mother writes to me," a boy down at Camp Upton told me one day, "are heart-breaking. She didn't want me to go away, and she's got a fixed idea in her head that I'm never coming back. She writes pages to me, telling me how she misses me, and how lonely the house is, and wondering what she will do when I get into active fighting." The boy sighed—a real sigh that was more than vaguely troubled—before he went on.

"I don't like this war stuff," he told me finally, "any more than—than any of the other fellows like it! But there's work to be done and we're the ones to do it! It's our job to keep a steady hand and a stiff upper lip. And mothers like mine—though she meant well with her letters, bless her heart!—don't help us to be brave!"

In direct contrast was another boy's laughing praise of his women-folk!

"My mother and sister," he told me

"and, yes, my sweetheart, are real people! They haven't shown the white feather once. I'm the only son. But my mother didn't cry when I left. She said, 'I'll be expecting you to come home at least a general, Jimmy!' And then she kissed me, and we all laughed. Maybe our laughing was a bit shaky. I don't know!"

"And ever since I've been at camp all three of them have been writing me the dandiest letters! Mother sends me clippings from the town paper and notes from my old school, and sister writes regular novels, and The Girl is going right on buying furniture and linens as if there wasn't a chance of anything happening to me. Why, their letters have put so much grit into me that I'm sure if I were wounded—and badly, too—I'd be able to crawl back with a picture of their smiling faces in my mind. They're real people, they are!"

OH, women of America—you who are mothers, and sisters, and sweethearts, and wives, and good friends to our soldiers—make the letters that you send them the right sort of letters, happy, gay, hopeful! Don't make them piteous missives that will take the heart out of our boys—the sort that will bring lumps into throats.

The boys who are fighting know what they are fighting for. They know that they are fighting to make the world safe for democracy, for righteousness and justice, and for an ultimate and lasting peace. They wouldn't be fighting, otherwise! So it isn't necessary to tell them about it in your letters, any more than it is necessary to tell them how much you miss them. They know that, too.

So write and tell them intimate things. Tell them that the purple flags are blossoming again in the back yard by the fence; that the dining-room is being repapered. Tell them about the blue sash that Nellie Smith wore to the Mission Band lawn party, and about the visiting Glee Club that gave an entertainment in the club rooms of the parish house, and about the trolley line they're talking of running through town. Enclose a sample of your new spring frock in the letter, and a snapshot of yourself in the big porch rocker, and the funny little verse that you read in your favorite magazine and laughed over. For now that our boys are away from home and home influences, they are more than ever interested in the little homey things that are just bits of everyday life to us. With the sound of guns not far away, a music box in the home parlor holds a magnet-like lure; and with suffering on every hand the picture of a sunny garden-place has a new meaning. The letters that are written bravely, so bravely (for, oh, it's harder to write a light-hearted cheery letter, these days, than a profound one) that they hold this intimate touch, will be the bonds that will tie these boys, wherever they may be, to home and the things that stand for home.

MR. CARSON was for many years the American representative of the newspapers and other periodicals controlled by the Northcliffe organizations, and had intimate relations with the master-spirit of that organization, Viscount Northcliffe himself. The result of being thus happily placed is that Mr. Carson in this book has been able to give us glimpses of the real man he is writing about. He shows us Lord Northcliffe not only at work, but at play; not only does he show him in one of his several offices, engaged in directing one or the other of his numerous vast journalistic enterprises, but he takes us down to the country and gives us a picture of Lord Northcliffe in his moments of repose and relaxation. The advantage of such a complete view of the book's central figure is obvious.

Very naturally, Mr. Carson, as the result of his intimate relations, finds much that is admirable in the central figure of his book. The first half of the volume, that dealing with Lord Northcliffe's life up to the beginning of the present war, is the most valuable not only because it is the most balanced, but also because this portion of the book deals with events which have now sufficient perspective in point of time to enable the author to exercise a reasoned judgment as to their relative importance and the permanence of their results.

Northcliffe is unquestionably one of the greatest figures in the history of British journalism from many viewpoints, and the record of his achievements between 1888 and 1914 makes fascinating reading. There can be no denial of this greatness, because otherwise one would be confronted with the difficult task of explaining how a boy of twenty-three, without other capital than that locked within his own brain, succeeded in a very few years not only in acquiring a large fortune, but also in reaching a position of power and influence probably never before attained by any British journalist.

Even if this impossible explanation were given, one would still be faced by an even worse riddle; that of accounting for the fact that, since the moment of his first success, he had steadily gone from success to further success, continuously increasing the bounds of the sphere of his power and influence, until today he is acknowledged at the head of his profession the world over.

From the glimpses Mr. Carson gives us of the character of the man, it would seem as though Lord Northcliffe, like Alexander Hamilton, possesses that extraordinary quality of being able instinctively to grasp the vital point in any transaction, and the ability to concentrate his entire strength and power on that point. Add to this rare faculty a strong will, common sense, and the love of hard work, and we have some appreciation of the mental endowments which have placed Northcliffe where he is today.

Mr. Carson brings out these elements of Northcliffe's character clearly in the course of his narration, and points his delineation from time to time with appropriate and forcible anecdotes of the man and his methods. In the later portion of his book Mr. Carson is dealing with that phase of Northcliffe's life—the political—in which he is obliged to write more about the opinions and aims of the man, than of actually achieved results. Nevertheless, this latter portion is necessary to a complete understanding of Northcliffe's many-sided character; and considering the difficulties of treating this phase of the subject, the author's work is exceedingly well done.

The book is well worth reading as an intimate view of one of the most interesting figures of our day—that of a man who has done much to mold public opinion and influence events, and whose whole career is a striking illustration of concentrated purpose, combined with extraordinary will power and clear vision.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

"CHERRY Ripe! Cherry Ripe!" The words of the old ballad come back to us, these busy days. For not only are cherries ripe, but luscious strawberries, and velvet-skinned peaches, and the long pink-and-green stalks of our tart friend the rhubarb!

Even these are not all. There are greens galore, dear adventurers: the kinds you know and a dozen succulent varieties you have never become acquainted with. There are early fruits and vegetables without number; berries of almost as many tints and flavors as the fruit-drop candies in the corner drug-store; and (now and then) there is on hand a tender bit of meat, or a bowlful of nourishing stock; too rich in protein for summer fare, yet "too good" to throw away.

Is this the situation with you? Ah, I thought so! For even we city housewives are surrounded on every side by good things fairly begging to be canned. The strawberries beckon to us from the fruit-stands: their little yellow eyes all atwinkle in the sunshine; and the red-cheeked cherries laugh up at our windows from a huckster's cart, luring us down from our fourth-story apartments to the street and along it in breathless pursuit.

Even our friends give us no peace. When we meet them on street or trolley, it is no longer "What are you doing these days?" but "What are you canning this week?" And woe to her who cannot puff out her chest with pardonable pride and tick off on her fingers the contents of rows of jars, or cans, stored away in the darkest, coolest place her little apartment affords.

For, dear neighbors, this is the "day" of the American woman who cans. Of all the petticoat soldiers enrolled in Uncle Sam's great Home Army, she is the staunchest: the most valuable. You will find her, furthermore, in every walk of life: business life, school life, home life—her canning never interfering with her other duties.

I know, for instance, of a business girl who buys cheaply, late on Saturday afternoons, from a little huckster all his unsold fruit and vegetables apt to spoil before Monday, canning these at once in her small apartment. And I know of a town in New Jersey—Elizabeth by name—where, this summer, all the schools are to be kept open as canning-demonstration stations, the domestic science teachers giving the pupils the asked-for aid and instructions. Furthermore, I know of a farm woman, out in the West, who for years has not only been canning every surplus spoonful of food, but has generously made her home the center of encouragement and help for other women struggling with the intricacies of canning.

As her story is a capital one, I am going to call her to the platform at once, and let her talk directly to you, fellow members of the American Community Club.

ALLOW me, then, to introduce to you Mrs. A. E. Kephart, of Oklahoma. May her adventure in neighboring have the message for you it did for me:

Teaching the Neighbors to Can

Six years ago, a prominent banker of our neighborhood offered a prize of seventy-five dollars in gold for the greatest number of farm products for the table raised on one farm, prepared by a farm wife, and exhibited at our county Farmers' Day Exhibit.

I won the prize, exhibiting one hundred and ninety-six prepared articles for the table. I told the judges from our A. and M. College that I would show the people that in case of war we farm wives could supply our families with plenty of good food of all kinds. I did not then think it possible that in such a short time the world would be at war, and the necessity of food-conservation be with us.

At the exhibit so many questions were asked me as to how I prepared the different articles, that I found it impossible to answer them all. So I told the women and girls who wished information that I would try to help them, either personally or by phone or letter. They took me at my word, and ever since then have kept me busy. I have had phone and personal calls from all over the country, and letters of inquiry from five different states. Many women have come to my home for me to demonstrate to them how I canned fruit, made homemade cream cheese, and so on.

While all this has taken time and patience, it has been a great pleasure. And when a girl who was a winner in the canning contest and several other departments of her Canning Club work came to me with a glowing, happy look and told me that it was my help which had made her able to win the prizes, I felt well repaid.

There are so many helpful things we older women can give out of our experience to our younger neighbors, if only we will!

Mrs. A. E. K.

Doesn't that dynamic adventure set you to thinking of the young neighbors around you: of the discouraged bride next door who has quit trying to can, after spoiling a great quantity of fruit; or of your own little daughter, who has never canned a jar of fruit in her life; or perhaps of the tall girls who flock past to a high school where there is no domestic science course, and who would "just adore" to come out into your kitchen and be taught?

If so, friend—if your heart is big and generous, like that—then, for the sake of the winning of this war (and also the winning of these girls to useful womanhood), do something! Either write to the United States Department of Agriculture, asking that a girls' canning club be started by one of the government demonstration agents; or else start a small class yourself. So as to hold the girls' interest all through the year, it can be a cooking class in the winter and a canning class in the summer, like the class described in the following adventure from a New York neighbor:

A Girls' Canning and Cooking Class

Our canning and cooking class was a wonderful thing to us girls; for we were all between the ages of twelve and sixteen and just naturally loved to "make things." We met every week, after school, and our dues were five cents per week. Each week we planned and cooked a whole dinner, so that when we went home we could relieve our mothers at least once a week and have what we called our "home cooking night." Our recipes were printed, and we kept them in little note books. Every one of us still has her recipe book, and none of us would part with it.

In canning time, our wonderful teacher (a dear Christian woman) taught us the most efficient ways of preserving and canning. Our preserves were sent to the sick; and the canned vegetables were messengers of cheer to the needy. Whenever we heard of a shut-in or invalid, Miss Manners (our teacher) would think of some tempting dish we might make and send her.

But to us girls, I am sure, the best part of our fun was eating what we had made ourselves. Have you ever felt the elation that comes from having accomplished something? Well, you can then imagine about eight or ten girls all sitting around a big table in their caps, aprons and sleeves, eating the food they had themselves prepared. Each one was given a particular dish to make, and the others watched so they would know how, too. Then, while things were cooking, two of the girls would be appointed to set the table and serve.

We were not only taught how to cook, in our little class, but to keep house; and we are grateful today for the systematic and efficient ways we were trained in. I know I have profited by my lessons learned in that cooking class, and I am passing this on in the hope that some neighbor who is anxious to help the girls of her community (and also to help Uncle Sam conserve food) will adopt this suggestion and take under her wing those who really want to learn to cook.

I must not omit to add that our little class also had its social hour, and that at the end of the season we gave an exhibition. I remember a four-line rhyme we sang at one exhibition. It was this:

A woman's arm may work a charm,
As well as woman's looks;
And though we praise her winning ways,
She's fairest when she cooks.

A NEW YORK NEIGHBOR.

Could a more wholly delightful little class be imagined, neighbors, than this one? I think not. But—I will tell you more about it next week.

Young People's Topics for June 30

The Power of the Cross in Africa

Christian Endeavor Topic. Acts 8:26-39

THE church that grew out of Philip's conference with the eunuch might have evangelized the greatest of continents so that there would never have been a darkest Africa, but it remained for European and American Christianity to lighten its spiritual darkness. African missions are largely the product of the last generation. Henry M. Stanley's search for Livingstone turned the eyes of the world toward the dark continent, and the heart of Christendom gained a vision of service as its eyes saw a vision of need. Today from the West, from the East and from the South Christian missions are rolling back the shadows of superstition and ignorance that have bound the black man. In the power of the Cross, the womanhood of Africa is being raised from serfdom; the manhood of Africa is learning to put its strength into useful work instead of warfare; the childhood of Africa is being given, through education, an opportunity to take its place among the free peoples of the world. From the north there is descending an organized mission of Islam, and Africa today is the greatest battle-ground between Christ and the Prophet. Christian missions in Africa are not only bringing salvation from sin, but through their schools of agriculture and their free shops they are fitting the people of Africa to be wage earners and producers. All through the Jungle cultivated lands mark the work of the missionary and the bells of little chapels call the black man and his tribes to prayer and praise.

A Bible for Every Man

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Psalm 19

ALTHOUGH "the heavens declare the Glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork," only in the Scriptures is his spirit and his heart revealed. The Bible is the book for men of all ages and all generations. The open Bible reverently read is a power for righteousness. The man who heeds its warnings and reads its precepts is assured of greater happiness and health and peace of mind, and if not of prosperity at least of greater joy in the things he has. The man who tries to live without the Bible, who disregards its precepts and flouts its warnings, may flourish like the green bay tree for a time, but the reckoning is certain. The Bible is every man's book, and it should be in the hands of every man, and, until it is thus widely spread, civilization will falter and fall short of the ideal of Christ.

Our Heritage as Americans

Epworth League Topic. Acts 22:2, 3; 21-39; Psalm 137-3-8

EVERY child born into the world has some sort of a heritage, even if it be nothing more than traits of character. A child born in America, even though he inherit little of this world's goods, has a heritage of freedom which is worth more than all the things in the world without it. There is no limit in America to what any man may achieve. Birth counts little; worth is everything. Friends are useful but force of character has an unfenced path. The free public school opens its doors to all. The preaching of the Gospel is unfettered, and a man may live or work where he pleases. Because his father is a farmer he need not farm, although he is wise if he does. He may be a doctor, a lawyer, a professor, or an engineer, and these courses are his at practically no cost, in schools maintained by the state. Founded by Christian people, America gives also to her sons an atmosphere of moral uprightness in which it is easy to live well. Liberty, education, unlimited opportunity, with the path of right well marked, all these are our heritage under the Stars and Stripes. To preserve these we may well fight. Having this heritage, we owe a deep debt to those who come to us from countries in which ignorance or despotism or lack of opportunity hold men back.

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

REPORT OF THE MOST MOMENTOUS AND MOST IMPORTANT CONFERENCE ON RETURN OF OUR LORD

A Co-ordinated, Constructive Teaching—Being the Addresses Delivered at the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference, May 28 to 30, 1918.

THE great Philadelphia Bible Conference has come and gone. The unanimous judgment is that it was the most momentous and important of its kind ever held in America, or perhaps in the world, both in numbers and significance. Many of the speakers declared from the platform that they had never faced such multitudes of deeply earnest searchers of the Bible. It was a Conference which at every session exalted Christ, and gave rich and stirring messages to His people throughout the world. There was no effort on the part of any speaker to exploit himself. From first to last, there was evidence in all that was said, that the most consecrated scholarship and reverent investigation were under divine guidance, and submissive to the leadings of the Holy Spirit. There was an entire absence of anything like radicalism, sensationalism, date-fixing, and dogmatism. The great fundamental belief of the Christian Church was discussed with a calm serenity that indicated conviction of its truth.

The immense gatherings, from first to last, had the spirit of American loyalty combined with the great Christian hope, exemplified in a remarkable degree. The speeches of the Conference will be welcomed by Christians and Bible readers everywhere, and especially by those who love the Lord Jesus Christ and believe in His promise. These addresses have been gathered under the official supervision of the Conference Executive Committee, and published by the Christian Herald in an authorized volume of some 300 pages under the title of "Light on Prophecy." This step was taken by the Conference in order that the widest possible publicity might be assured for the book, as the record of the most authoritative assembly on prophecy ever held up to the present time.

The far-reaching character of the addresses may be seen from the following list of speakers and topics:

Notable Addresses Included in "Light on Prophecy"

- "Hath God Spoken?" and "What is to Become of the Church?"
By Dr. Harris H. Gregg, Pastor of Winnipeg, Canada, an eminent Canadian Divine.
- "What is Prophecy?" and "Where Is Christ Now and What Is He Doing?"
By Rev. John MacInnes of Syracuse, Secretary of the Montrose Bible Conference.
- "The Doctrine of Our Lord's Return"
By Dr. Mark A. Matthews, Former Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church.
- "The Answer to the Greatest Question Jesus Ever Asked" and "What Manner of Persons Ought We to Be?"
By Dr. William B. Riley, of the First Baptist Church of Minneapolis, Minn., and President of the Northwest Bible School.
- "Did the Cross of Christ Fulfill All the Promises?" and "The Coming Glory"
By W. L. Pettingill, Dean of the Philadelphia School of the Bible.
- "God's Purpose in This Dispensation" and "Regathering of Israel in Unbelief"
By Dr. James M. Gray, of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, Ill.
- "The Capture of Jerusalem"
By Rev. A. E. Thompson, A.B., Pastor of the American Church at Jerusalem.
- "War on German Theology"
By Dr. Cortland Myers, Pastor of the Tremont Baptist Temple, Boston, Mass.
- "Coming Events Cast Their Shadows" and "Will There Be Any Tears in Heaven and Why?"
By Rev. P. W. Philpott, Hamilton, Canada.
- "Has God a Program?"
By Rev. B. B. Sutcliffe.
- "Does This Truth Paralyze or Energize?"
By Rev. Herbert Mackenzie, Pastor of the Gospel Church, Cleveland, Ohio, and Secretary of the Fireside Bible Conference.

How the Timken Taper Guards the Path of Power

In the Transmission

Where power passes from gear to gear, the force of the engine is being resisted by the car's "inertia"—the unwillingness of a heavy body to move.

If the transmission bearings wear loose under this pressure of conflicting forces, shafts drop out of line, gears fail to mesh accurately, their true rolling contact is destroyed and the ultimate result is noisy, badly worn, power-wasting gears.

The Timken Taper not only means less wear in transmission bearings, but an easy means of taking up wear before gears are affected. It keeps your transmission and bearings as good as new after thousands of miles of service.

On the Pinion Shaft

Here again engine and inertia strive for mastery—but here, in addition to heavy side pressure on the rollers is "end-thrust," pushing cone and rollers against the "cup" of the bearing.

Both car-builder and car-owner profit by having Timken Bearings at the post of hard service. Their conical shape enables them to meet both forces in one bearing—and their adjustability helps to assure you of long-lived, smooth-running gears.

At the Differential

The differential gear housing forms a unit with the big driving gear in the rear axle. The whole unit must be kept accurately in adjustment so that the driving gear and pinion will be in correct mesh and axle shafts will run true.

At this crucial point where "power turns a corner," the long-wearing qualities and adjustability of Timken Bearings are of prime importance.

In Wheels and Knuckle Heads

The supreme test of bearing quality comes here, where load is heaviest; end-thrust at its maximum; bumps, jolts, and vibration incessant.

Here the Timken Taper first won its reputation. Here it proves daily in almost every well known motor-car and truck the correctness of its design, the sturdy dependability of its construction and the high quality of Timken made steel.

From engine to wheels, the Timken Taper renders a service in guarding the path of power, for which the wise car-builder gladly pays the higher price of Timken Quality.

“What! My Car?”

“Yes! skidded—and it’s up to you. You failed to provide the chauffeur with Tire Chains. Only good luck saved your wife from paying the supreme penalty for your negligence. She’s on the way to the hospital painfully injured, but the doctor thinks she’ll pull through. You’d better hurry to the hospital and then report to headquarters.”

How strange it is that disaster must come to some men before they realize that all makes and types of tires will skid on wet pavements and muddy roads when not equipped with Chains.

These men do not appreciate until too late, that by failing to provide Weed Anti-Skid Chains they expose their families to injury and death.

The time to provide against accidents is before they happen. Don’t wait until after the first skid. Put Weed Chains on all four tires at the first indication of slippery going and you will have quadruple protection against injury, death, car damage, and law suits.

Weed Chains are sold for All Tires by Dealers Everywhere

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

John Wanamaker at Eighty

A Personal Interview

By

MARGARET E. SANGSTER

John Wanamaker took my hand in the friendliest sort of greeting.

"Well," he said, "here you are! Now, what can I do?"

"I want to write about you," I told him, "and thought perhaps you could give me a message to pass that picture is an important one. It shows the turning point in the battle of Gettysburg, which was, incidentally, the turning-point of the whole war. It took the artist who painted that picture ten years to complete it. Why? Because he went around hunting out the different men, still living, who were veterans of that battle. He wanted the faces in that picture to be the real faces of real men!

"That's the kind of work that folk should do. Tell that to the young people who read the Christian Herald! If a task's worth doing, it's worth doing in a thorough way."

I looked up at the picture. The faces in it—they had seemed just ordinary faces before—took on a new significance now.

"Yes," I answered—"I'll tell them that."

John Wanamaker was speaking again. "Any work that's worth doing is worth doing thoroughly," he repeated, "and it's worth putting one's whole soul into. There was a little lady who sang at our church yesterday. She wasn't much to look at—small, she was, and not very well built—but when she began to sing,

"It was 'La Marseillaise'. And her body grew tense as she sang it and there was a thrill in her voice and—shutting your eyes—you could see a picture of all France marching off to battle. It made me cry—her song. Why? Because she put her whole soul into the singing of it!"

John Wanamaker paused abruptly. He reached into a small vest pocket and brought out a tiny Testament, bound in pig-skin.

"I knew a young man," he told me—"who wanted to join the church. He went to the deacons about it, and they questioned him.

"Why," they asked, 'do you want to join the church?'

"The young man thought a moment. Then he flushed. 'I'm twenty-eight years old,' he answered, 'and I think it's time I joined something.'"

John Wanamaker opened the little Testament reverently. As I watched him, it came to me that it was a fine and rather unusual thing to see the head of a great business sitting in his inner office in the midst of a crowded day, there with the swirl of commerce eddying all about him, his white head bent above a little volume that held the Word of God. "There are just two verses," he said, "that I want to read to you."

AS he turned the pages, I saw that the Testament was marked, here and there. On almost every page some well-loved passage had been emphasized by underlining.

"I am crucified with Christ," he read in a resonant voice, "nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

"That young man," said Mr. Wanamaker, looking up from the Testament, "was not living by the faith of the Son of God. If he had been living that way, he would have known why he was joining the church!"

Again the silvered head bent over the Testament, as the capable fingers—fingers that are young fingers, that do not seem eighty years old—turned a few pages. And again he read a text.

"And this is his commandment," said the resonant voice, "that we should believe in the name of his Son, Jesus Christ, and love one another."

It was then that I realized why the great store had such an air of peace about it, and why the name of its owner is like a white milestone on the road of commerce! But John Wanamaker was speaking again.

"Man is the only thing on earth," he was saying, "that resists God. Man is the only living thing that doubts his part in the great scheme. The birds of the air do not pause to question why, they build their nests and get their food—they fly south in the winter and north in the summer-time! They never doubt on to the young people who read the Christian Herald; that you would tell them something about yourself and your success."

John Wanamaker laughed a little, hearty laugh.

"Bless you," he said at last, "I'd much rather not talk about myself. And as for a message—well, I'm not sure that I know what to say. It's risky business, anyway, this business of writing an article about a man before he's dead. There's no telling what he may do!"

He paused for a moment.

"I had a friend, once," he resumed, "who wanted to start a railroad and run it through to the Pacific. Building a railroad was a bigger business then than it is now, and suddenly he blossomed into a famous character. People began naming their children after him—And then—then his plans failed!" John Wanamaker paused again. "Well," he said finally, "the people all changed their children's names. You see, he wasn't famous any more. That's why," he laughed again—"that's why it isn't safe to write about me!"

"But a message from you, Mr. Wanamaker," I interposed, "would mean a great deal to many—"

Mr. Wanamaker raised his hand quite suddenly, and pointed to a picture that hung on the wall. It was a battle-scene—a Civil War battle.

"Do you see that picture?" he questioned. "Well,

ONCE, long ago, in the pages of a certain green-and-gold book of Make-Believe, I read the story of a marvelous man who was referred to, upon occasion, as a Merchant Prince. Being, at the time, more interested in the plot of the story than in the details of it, I skipped blandly over said references and brushed them aside with the many other things that I did not understand. And I fancy that the title did not come into my head again until yesterday when, for the first time, I met a real merchant prince—John Wanamaker.

Throughout the business world John Wanamaker's name stands for sterling quality, up-to-date business methods and honesty. But in his home city, Philadelphia, the name of John Wanamaker stands for much more than quality and honesty. It stands for faith, and charity, and religion. In Bethany Church, John Wanamaker is known and loved as the Superintendent of the Sunday School, the head of the Y. M. C. A., and the leading spirit of every good work.

On the eleventh of July, Mr. Wanamaker will be eighty years old. There are few men in the world, I think, who can look back over eighty years of such success and service as he can. It was because of that success and service, and because he is famed for his kindness and graciousness, that I went, yesterday, from New York to Philadelphia to get a personal message from him—a personal message given on the eve of his eightieth birthday to the readers of The Christian Herald.

As I went through the wide flung doors of the great store in Philadelphia, I was acutely conscious of the bigness of the place—a bigness that was much deeper and more poignant than the mere impression of vast floor spaces, and high ceilings, and enormous quantities of stock. And I was conscious of a certain air of peace and contentment, as if, back of the store's calm surface, a great machinery was running with precision and regularity.

NEVER before had I gone into a department store with the fixed idea of not buying anything. Always in such a store, I had walked toward a certain given point where a particular article might be purchased. But yesterday I went with a deeper purpose in view—that of seeing the power behind it all. And, because I went with that object, I found I could read the personal characteristics of John Wanamaker himself into the contentment, well being and good management of the place.

The executive offices of the store are on the seventh floor. Upon leaving the elevator, I found myself in the midst of what seemed to be a wilderness of desks, each with its clicking typewriter, or adding-machine, or other symbol of up-to-date business activity. By inquiring of those people who happened to cross my path, I found my way to the group of rooms that are Mr. Wanamaker's private offices. There I gave my name to the boy in one of the outer rooms and sat down to wait.

I looked around carefully, for I like to study rooms—particularly rooms that have to do with the lives of well known people. Rooms can show personality very clearly, and this outer office reflected the personality of John Wanamaker just as the whole store reflected it. There were paintings on the wall—not many of them, but good ones. And there was a bit of curious old tapestry showing a fat gladiator in the act of killing a lion who looked, despite the circumstances, foolishly happy. And there were filing-cases around the wall, and polished desks.

It was while I was looking at the tapestry that the boy came back and told me that Mr. Wanamaker would see me. He turned toward a door leading to an inner room, and I followed. The brain and heart of the two greatest department stores in the world was sitting at his desk. And as I came to him, across the room, he looked up and smiled at me. Then I forgot that he was the head of a great and successful organization—forgot that I had been a bit nervous, and I felt just glad and very much at home. It was like that.

Mont-Lawn Opens Its Doors

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SUMMER has swept on the city,
Swept with its fear and its pain;
But Mont-Lawn, the haven of children,
Has opened its doors again.
Has opened its doors to the little ones,
Who fade in the blinding heat,
Like flowers flung by a careless hand
On a sun-baked city street.

Summer has swept on the city;
But Mont-Lawn is far away
From the blinding glare of the city sun.
On even the warmest day,
There's always a little vagrant breeze,
That creeps through the trees, and sings
Of garden spots, and of forest nooks,
Of rivers and pleasant things!

Summer has swept on the city;
But Mont-Lawn has sent a call
To the little folk of the city slums,
Telling them, one and all,
To come to a land of turquoise skies,
A land where the air is sweet,
Where the green of the grass is daisy-starred,
And there's plenty of food to eat!

Summer has swept on the city;
But clear through each scorching slum,
The little children have heard the call,
And with singing hearts they come—
Come like pilgrims, their eager eyes
Advance with the joy of life—
And Mont-Lawn is like a dream to them,
Who knew but the city's strife.

Summer has swept on the city;
But, cool in the pleasant shade
The children romp through the country fields,
Playing as you have played
When you were a little country child,
And laughed through the livelong day. . . .
Summer has swept on the city,
But the city is far away!

Summer has swept on the city,
But you and the gifts you gave
Have stretched a hand through the fever heat,
A hand that is strong to save
The little ones of the city streets
From terror and fear and pain—
For, through you, the Children's Heaven
Has opened its doors again!

that there is a God! But man questions the truth of the Bible, and the divinity of Christ; he doubts and demands proof. I once heard an atheist dare God to strike him dead and then, because he did not die, proclaim that God was afraid of him!"

John Wanamaker, his head flung back, his face set in thoughtful lines, looked far off into space. His eighty years lay upon him gracefully. When he spoke again, he was still looking far off and his voice was very low and soft.

"About the end of every year, I get tired," he told me, "and then I go down to Florida, to a little place in the swamps—a little place of islands. Indeed, there are so many islands that the place is spoken of as the 'Ten Thousand Islands.'"

"Not many people go there, for they are afraid of snakes and crocodiles. But I go there at the end of every year. And I sit in a summer-house on one of the islands, very early in the dawn-time, when the morning star is going to meet the sun. I watch the sun rise, and as it comes up, in a burst of glory, I find myself saying aloud, to it:

"Don't you ever get tired of shining? You've been at it for so many thousands of years! Don't you ever get tired?" And it always seems as if the sun smiles back at me, and says:

"No, sir! I don't get tired of shining! Why, it's my part in creation!"

In the outer office a telephone rang, and a secretary hurriedly brought in a message. With a start, I came back from the little lonely island in Florida to the Philadelphia office of the man who had given me a generous slice out of a busy morning. I rose, and Mr. Wanamaker, in courtly fashion, rose with me.

"I'm afraid," he said, and there was a shade of regret in his voice, "that I haven't given you much of a message to take back to the people who read the Christian Herald; but—" and all at once his face seemed to brighten magically—"you tell them what the sun says to me! And tell them to be like the sun—to do their part in the creation without faltering or complaining or even questioning—'to do it because it is their part.' Tell them that's my message!"

And so I left John Wanamaker—a merchant prince, indeed, with the golden prize of success in his hand, and the fine gold of human kindness in his heart. And as I went out through the wonder of his great store, I found myself thinking of each busy aisle as an artery that drew from a great throbbing heart. And as the center of it all, I saw, as I will always hereafter see it, the picture of a man sitting behind a very businesslike desk with his silvered head bowed in all reverence over a tiny Book!

Volunteer Christian Workers in China

THE American Presbyterian Mission at Tengchow, North China, has long felt the need of a Bible Class of select Christian workers to be carefully trained for local voluntary church work and class-leading, and the plans for such a class have now been successfully carried out. In preparing for the class, a careful survey was made during the fall months, by an evangelist and missionary in consultation with the evangelists on the field, to select two or three of the most suitable men from each center to come to the city of Tengchow for a month's Bible instruction.

About fifty men from seven counties were enrolled. Among them were elders, deacons, voluntary colporteurs and managers of boys' and girls' country day-schools. Each man before entering the class had to sign his name to a pledge to remain a month for study and later to return home to do local voluntary work for the church.

The rising hour was 6 A.M. Morning Watch, 6:30 to 7 A.M. From 7 to 8 A.M. all met for prayers. For each morning a different leader was appointed to take the meeting. The book of Romans and the first twelve chapters of I Corinthians was used for our responsive reading. Each morning we had a definite object to pray for. At first many were unable to pray in public, but after having attended prayers for a month they gained in courage and facility and we were surprised at the progress they had made.

A few days before the close of the class, a slip of paper was handed to each member asking him to write on one side the "benefits" he had received during the month's study, and on the other side what he "purposed" to do at home. The returns were most gratifying and bore a promise of greater things for the church in the villages to which these men were to return. A few of the benefits were as follows: "I now know how to pray and sing," "Before I did not know how to lead a meeting," "I received more Gospel during the past month than all the year at home," "I now fully understand the effect of evil customs." The following are a few of the answers to the question, "What do you purpose to do at home?" "I plan to lead my whole family to Christ," "I plan to teach the Sunday-school lessons and lead the weekly prayer-meeting," "I plan to show by my life and character that I belong to Jesus." These 48 men are pledged to lead 62 people to Christ.

The delegates, returning home, felt they were well repaid for the time spent, and each testified that he realized more than ever before that he had a vital part in the direct evangelistic work of the church, and that his prayer and spiritual life had been greatly benefited.

Changes in Relief Work

By
MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

THE entire Caucasus Branch of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief has left its field and is on its way home. With them are the members of the Armenian Relief Committee under the Lord Mayor's Fund, and other English people who could get away from Tiflis. The party, which left Tiflis March 23, numbered forty-six. From the main relief center at Erivan there were Dr. Reynolds, Mr. and Mrs. Yarrow and family, Mr. and Mrs. Maynard and family, Mr. and Mrs. White, and Mr. James. Associated with them were three Englishmen: Dr. Kennedy, lent by the Lord Mayor's Fund, and Mr. Heald and Mr. Welsh, former members of the Society of Friends in the Samara district.

The Alexandropol group included Mr. and Mrs. Compton, Mr. Partridge and Miss Orvis, Mr. Elmer, whose work was at Etchmiadzin, and Mr. Stapleton, who has labored in Erzerum for a score of years. Mr. Craig and Mr. Wells of the Y. M. C. A. and myself were the other American members of the party.

Mr. Backhouse and Mr. Catchpool, who had charge of the Lord Mayor's Fund work at Igdir, Mrs. Harrison, wife of the manager of the Indo-Bombay Telegraph Company in Tiflis, and her two daughters, Miss Renaud, Miss Cumming, Miss Creighton and Miss Weld accompanied the American Mission. Mr. Samuel, an Assyrian-American merchant, and his wife and family, took this means of getting away alive. Captain Gracey, who is Irish by birth and American missionary by training, was unable to join the party, and probably came later or went out by way of Persia. Mr. Elder and Mr. Arrol, of the Y. M. C. A., stayed with him in Erivan.

The return of the workers was necessitated by political conditions. Consul Smith of Tiflis, under whose able direction the work is still being carried on as well as possible, is trusted and confided in by Armenians, Georgians and Tartars alike. There is no question that the move was well advised. It was a reluctant withdrawal. Dr. Reynolds has labored and been loved in Van for the greater part of his long and inspiring life. His sainted wife gave up her life for the Armenians. Dr. Reynolds would gladly have done the same. For his heart is back there in Van, where he is loved by all, and in Erivan, where he headed an orphanage work among a hundred of the choicest boys of the Armenian race. The Yarrow and Maynards had been forced to retreat in 1915, and had hurried back to give aid at the first opportunity. Eight of the workers had spent five trying months getting to their field, and had been able to serve for only three months before having to start on the tedious journey back.

NOT only were the Turks and Germans making rapid advances that would hem them in, but the Tartars throughout the whole Transcaucasian district were aroused, and the Persians, under German urging, were showing unmistakable signs of unfriendliness. To have stayed would not only have risked their own lives, but might have added to the persecutions of those whom they sought to aid.

Yet the time of their leaving was one of the decisive crises in the unhappy life of the Armenian race. The financial situation was very grave. A month before leaving, several members of the Committee had to cross into Persia and bring back two million roubles at great risk. Telegraphic communication was suspended, not only with America but even with Russia. The whole financial situation was in a state of chaos. Had the members stayed they might have been without funds. But as one Armenian after another said: "It is not for your money that we want you to stay. It is that we may have some trusted friends with us when the end comes."

Armenia, or rather the pitifully small remnant of it, having been encouraged by representatives of the Allied Powers, had taken up arms against the beasts who had massacred, looted, violated and deported in a vain attempt to erase the Armenian race and tradition from the earth. From Paris two telegrams had come, one through the British War Office and one through the French Foreign Office. These messages of cheer, dated December 15, 1917, told that a military mission was on its way to aid the brave but feeble Armenian army in its fight to hold the Allied line against the Turk. It was stated that financial backing was assured, and the telegrams urged the Armenians to start raising their army. The Russian Armenians, under permission from the Russian government, had already started to raise theirs. On December 15 the Armenian nation as one man stood ready to fight in the Allied cause. By the end of February, having had almost no financial assistance and no aid from military advisers or organizers, the combined Turkish and Russian Armenian forces, disorganized and untrained, were in disgraceful retreat from Erzerum, and the Armenian cause was nearly lost. They had had the temerity to sians and Armenians alike. It will stand as one of the noteworthy experiments in organized charity at a time of extreme need.

BUT the whole question, viewed in the large, simply points to the utter futility of individual relief when entire nations are making war. Had the work been ten times as great, it could not have averted a Turkish advance, for it was money given for relief, and not for military preparation. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," and although the work under the American Relief Committee was constructive work in a hundred different ways, it was a remedy rather than a preventative.

Governor Hambartsumian was so thoroughly in sympathy with the work of the American Relief Committee that he proposed to turn over the government funds for relief to us for administering. He spent much of his boyhood in America and is a great friend of American institutions. He admires us and believes in us. Time and again he expressed the hope that Americans could come to direct the building up of the new Armenia, with schools, expert advisers, agriculturalists, miners, capitalists and missionaries.

AS I write this on a train on the Amur Railway, somewhere north of Harbin, I believe the members of the American Committee are safely past the junction at Karuinskaya, where the Cossacks under Semenov are threatening to cut the line. Their long trip to the Japan Sea should soon be complete. The party had special cars, under the protection of the Tartar Committee from Tiflis to Baku; chartered a special boat from Baku to Astrakhan; had one of the finest Volga steamers from Astrakhan to Samara, and two private cars across Russia and Siberia to Vladivostok.

Obviously, on leaving, the first thing was to plan for a continuance of the work under the best possible circumstances. A great industrial plant, employing thousands of needy people, had been built up, and much good could still be done at a time of gravest crisis to the Armenian race.

Formerly, the Armenians have had some place to retreat to, but with the Turkish advance threatened from Batum as well as from Turkey, with the Tartars throughout the Caucasus arming for a war against the Christians, with Persia unfriendly and with Germany determined that the Armenian race shall be exterminated, the danger to Armenia and the Caucasus is very great. The Armenians are being left alone to face almost certain death. I only know of Dr. and Mrs. Crawford, whom the Turks honor in Trebizond, who are left to comfort the Armenians in their last stand against beastliness.

EVERYTHING possible having been done to ensure a continuance of the work as long as funds and materials last, the party set out with the best spirit possible for the journey. We did not know where the Germans and Turks were, but we believed them to be very near. We were told that Russia was in a state of utter anarchy. Consul Smith himself did not know where the Consulate-General or the American Embassy was located. All Transcaucasian news was German news. We had not a line of direct communication with the outside world. Vice-Consul Deolittle had been forced to go to Teheran in order to get in touch with Washington. The Germans spread the report that German forces had not only taken Petrograd, but were giving it such good government and prosperity as it had not known for years. The mark was made equal to the rouble, shoes and textiles were being freely sold at a fraction of their former cost, and the Germans were setting up mujik, proletariat and soldier alike to the best opera they had ever oppose the Turk, who kills and tortures even when he has no pretext. What mercy will they receive now?

I KNOW how it was in Van. I was the only American worker on Armenian soil, across the Turkish boundary. Day by day we expected that help would come. The defenders there staked all on their trust in the Allies.

When we left Tiflis, reliable news was not to be had. We did not know what was happening either in Russia or along the Turkish front. But the entire atmosphere was surcharged with what proved later to be groundless fears. The Germans were reported to be in Petrograd, Moscow and Rostov. The Turks were said to be advancing on Tiflis itself from Sarakamish and Batum, threatening to go on till they met the Russian army. These specific fears were at that moment groundless, but there was no mistaking the trend of events. For decades Turkey has tried to obliterate the Armenians. For decades Germany has planned and intrigued to arouse the Persians and the Tartars, and to seize the richest district, mile for mile, in the world—the granary, mineral vault and oil well known in geography as the Caucasus.

What for us meant a reluctant and dragging trudge homeward, for the Armenians meant the gravest crisis in their history. "You are leaving us," they said, without complaint or reproach. But we knew, every one, to what we were leaving them.

"Has it been worth while?" is a natural and fair question.

The money given and distributed has mounted into the millions. The activities of the American Relief Committee were everywhere recognized as the most economical, efficient and rational relief efforts that existed in a district aided by the most charitable people in the world. No one who did not know the work from the inside could realize the extent and variety of the work. It was almost universally praised by Rus-

When Christians Fight Are They Christians?

TEXT—Matt. 22:21. "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's."

I AM often asked: "Why do you choose the texts for your war sermons so generally from the Old Testament, not from the New Testament?" And I usually reply: "For the very good and sufficient reason that the Old Testament is the book of God's dealings with nations, while the New Testament is the book of God's dealings with individuals." Which reply not infrequently calls forth expressions of a personal and most earnest nature. "I do wish somebody would preach a New Testament war sermon," says one, "for, being an old-fashioned Christian, I should very much like to know my individual duty as a Christian in the present crisis. What is Christ's relation to the war? What is his view of the conflict? Would he have his followers stand aloof or participate? When Christians fight, are they Christians?"

Such questions are not treated in the rainbow books of the nations. They do not appear in the orange book, or the blue book. Nevertheless, back of all other questions of casuistry, these stand supreme. For some reason, a categorical answer is rarely ventured; possibly we have as yet arrived at no final conclusion in our own minds—such as we feel prepared to defend before the bar of public opinion.

I regard these questions as fair and natural. I believe they are asked in the utmost sincerity. So I shall attempt to answer them in an equally straightforward manner. When Christians fight, are they Christians? A natural question indeed. It is a sad fact that this is essentially a war between Christian nations. For this very reason, a state of panic prevailed in the early stages of the war on account of the apparent collapse of Christianity. According to statistics of 1905, Belgium is 99.9 per cent. professing Christian; Great Britain, 99.5 per cent.; Italy, 99.9 per cent.; France, 99.4 per cent.; Germany, 98.7 per cent.; Austro-Hungary, 94 per cent., and Russia 91.3 per cent. Christian. There is no dodging the fact that it is a war among Christians. Commenting upon these figures, some one has well said: "The nations think like angels and behave like beasts."

There are those who easily dispose of the question before us by quoting a proof text or two. Do not take proof texts too seriously. One may prove almost anything thus. Such use of Scripture is like trench warfare. Opposing factions from either side of No Man's Land hurl hand-grenade verses at each other, and "the letter of the Word killeth." When the fighting is over, what have you settled? You have simply increased the numbers of prejudiced parties drawn up in battle array against each other. The best military experts tell us today that it is a grave question whether trench warfare is in any sense conclusive.

Because Jesus said "Swear not at all," Tolstoy declared all oaths must be abolished. Because He said, "Judge not," courts of justice must go. Because He said, "Resist not evil," armies, navies, police departments and the like should be repudiated by the sincere Christian. All of which is non sequitur. For every text on one side of the argument there is a text on the other side. For each "Put up thy sword," in justification of extreme pacifism, there is "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one." The important matter is, why and to whom were the words spoken? We have been told that Christ drove the tradesmen from the temple under the lash. But he didn't. It is stated that the lash fell upon sheep and oxen if at all. "I send you as sheep among wolves" is made to prove Christianity non-resistant. But Christ was addressing a selected group of propagandists, not the vast army of organized Christianity. And propaganda in an unsympathetic land must of necessity be conducted without ostentation or overt act. Frequently the pacifist and militant alike draw upon the very same text to strengthen their respective positions. "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword," clearly justifying the use of the sword against the sword.

NOW, do we not pervert truth when we thus read into a text what was not in the mind or heart of the author? When Christians fight are they Christians? We would know the mind of the Master. Christ shall therefore answer the question for himself.

In the text before us, the question presented itself in more perplexing form than it does at this moment. But Jesus met it with a straightforward reply. You will recall that the Pharisees and the Herodians, the pacifists and the militarists, jointly laid the issues before the Great Teacher. Should Jews pay tribute to Cæsar? Should a nation of religionists support a nation of militarists? "Show me a penny," said Jesus. "Whose image and superscription is this?" "Cæsar's." "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's."

What is the teaching? This: There is no duty we owe to God that discharges us from the duty we owe to our country. The question presented to Christ was far more acute than any involved in America's war program. Militarism, to the Jew, presented a more embarrassing dilemma than the question of warring in self-defense. The Jews had been brought up to believe that they should pay no taxes whatever except to the synagogue. That was the law of the Jewish commonwealth. The Jewish commonwealth was not a political, but a religious confederation. Religion and patriotism were one and the same. So when an invading army came, took possession of their country, and exacted tribute, the situation was more than humiliating. It was positively revolting. Cæsar superimposed upon this democracy a tax out of which Roman soldiers were to be supported. They were in this dilemma. Should they rise in rebellion and cast out the invaders, or should they acquiesce and pay tribute to Cæsar? After the Scribes and Herodians had discussed it pro and con among themselves, they put the question to Christ. "Jesus, what do you say about this? How would you advise us? Is it right to pay tribute to Cæsar or not?" Either because the time was not ripe for revolution, or because he wanted them to feel the full pressure of the foreign yoke which they brought upon themselves by their sins, Jesus replied in substance as I have indicated, "There is no duty that you owe to high heaven that discharges, or from the duty that you owe to the powers that be."

"WELL," you say, "that is a dreadful, dreadful situation!" Indeed it is, and you will see why God permitted that situation to obtain in the Jewish commonwealth, in a democracy that gave us the setup for all future democracies.

Let me tell you something. You may go through the New Testament from the first line of Matthew to the last line of the Book of Revelation and you cannot find a single instance where Jesus was not a loyal patriot. Follow Jesus Christ through those last gloomy hours of his life as he is led from one court to another court, from Pilate's judgment hall to Herod's judgment hall, and before the Sanhedrin, and you find no evidence of sedition. Although he knew in his own soul that a most unrighteous and unjust judgment had been handed down, a most unmerited punishment meted out, he remained loyal to himself, to God and to society as then constituted. He was too practical and farsighted to put out the resplendent glory of the ideals which he came to enkindle in the hearts of men by a premature puff of revolution.

"But," you say, "did not Jesus tell Peter to put up his sword that night in the garden?" Quite true. So did Henry Ward Beecher rebuke John Brown when the latter tried to organize the slaves in insurrection. The reason in both cases was doubtless the same. The psychological moment is an immense factor in social development. An uprising at an ill-advised moment would have jeopardized the entire movement.

Nor is there the slightest evidence that the early followers of Jesus considered fighting inconsistent with their Christian profession. Whence came the Cross-dream of Constantine with its motto: "In this sign conquer?" Out of a subconsciousness that recognized the fighting merits of the followers of the Nazarene. Christians have always been good fighters, and may they continue to distinguish themselves as a church militant until the glad day when they shall become a church triumphant.

One of the great and inspiring visions of the hour is portrayed in a hymn—"Like a mighty army moves the Church of God." Only by keeping alive this militant spirit shall we cast out the iniquities that have so long cursed us, and make the laws of the Kingdom the law of this world. So long as we fought the saloon from pulpit and platform alone, the liquor interests laughed at us. But when the Anti-Saloon League went into action as a militant host the Church of the Living God began to get things done. There are times when we must beat the devil at his own game. I believe this is just such a time and this war is just such a game. Talk all you please about pacifism, about bringing the world to see the madness of war; but until we wage war upon the Potsdam gang and its machinations with the same determination we waged war upon the saloon, we shall arrive nowhere.

I look upon war as I look upon pain. War is to the body politic what pain is to the body physical. Suppose you never suffered pain. You would rush on to your grave at the first sickness. Pain is nature's alarm bell and red light. Pain it is that literally drives you to seek restoration. Pain it is that keeps you from the grave. War it is that God has used throughout the centuries to bring nations to the rule of reason. He makes the wrath of man to praise him. More than once he has used war to snatch a nation as a brand from the burning, and to compel it to seek "saving health among the nations."

SO much for the question itself. But here is a corollary more important even than the question. This is where the Gospel comes in. For the very reason that both duties must be discharged, it is high time for the Christian sentiment of the world to co-ordinate religion and statesmanship. You say, "I feel in this world war like a circus rider trying to straddle two horses. I am trying to ride a horse called Christianity and a horse called Patriotism, and I am conscious of making a sorry spectacle of myself." You are right. Jesus knew perfectly well how you would feel. He knew the Jews would feel that way. In fact, he wanted them to hear the laughter of conscience at their own ridiculous performance. Because no duty they owed to God could discharge them from the duty they owed their country, he perceived that the Jews would eventually be drawn, by sheer self-respect and a desire for rational living, to unify and co-ordinate the conflicting duties.

Unquestionably, the two greatest forces in the world today for good and evil are the Church and the State. There is not the slightest doubt as to that. Neither one can properly function without the other. This is being proved in the present war. The United States government has from the first systematically sought to enlist the co-operation of all ministers, together with the rank and file of the members. The Washington authorities have awakened to the fact that the government cannot properly function unless it co-ordinates with the Church in all its functions. It is time the Church should get the same vision. The Church cannot function properly unless governments are brought under the dominion of the same Lord Jesus Christ who controls individual action. Precisely this is what we are fighting for. We insist that the nations of the whole earth have no moral or legal right to do what an individual is not permitted to do. We propose no longer to tolerate a social economy in which one law shall regulate collective men, and another law individual men. The duty that man owes to Cæsar must be articulated with the duty he owes to God, if true co-operation and lasting peace are ever to be realized.

The double standard of life has wrought untold woe and disaster during the past fifty or a hundred years. As corporations and unions, men have done what the very same men would blush to do as individuals. A corporation could legally do in New York what it could not do in Iowa, and what no individual could do in any state. The double standard has cursed the Church and the world. Christian statesmanship is at last wide awake, and is demanding that the State and Church get together and build a new world wherein dwelleth righteousness.

Understand me, I am not pleading for an organic union of Church and State, but for something more real and abiding—spiritual union. Let us have a new world made up of new hearts. When the Church captures the State, you have Roman Inquisition; and when the state captures the Church you have German Militarism. We don't want either. But, when Christ captures the imagination and initiative of both Church and State, we shall have something approximating the millennium.

You have heard men say "business is business." That's one of the biggest lies out of the pit. Business is not business any more than religion is religion. Business is business plus religion, and religion is religion plus business. Patriotism is patriotism plus religion, and religion is religion plus patriotism. What God hath joined together let not man put asunder.

IT comes then to this: How is one to determine for oneself whether or not a given fight is being waged from sincere Christian motives?

There is not the shadow of a doubt in my own mind as to Christ's attitude toward this great war. I believe every child of God, every follower of the Prince of Peace, should actively, earnestly, persistently, loyally, even to the point of death, spend and be spent in the gigantic undertaking, for the cause is worth the price. The hour has struck to make the duty we owe to God and the duty we owe to a nation one full-orbed

Not Scared!

SUNDAY, June 30. Phil. 1:28. "In nothing terrified by your adversaries." The apostle takes his metaphor from a very sharp and vivid action. It is the figure of a startled horse shying at something which is only half seen, or which is mistaken for something else, and the horse is thrown into confusion, and into consequent peril of accident or disaster. And the apostle sees a similar peril in the Christian life. As we journey along the road we may encounter apparently fearful presences which may break up our serenity, causing us to shy from our appointed goings and plunge into danger of moral disaster. In panic we may lose our treasure. But the apostle does not merely suggest the danger; he tells us how we can be so prepared, and so strengthened and quieted, that we shall go along the most menacing road with confidence.

One of the most troublesome things on the way of life is the thing that is only partially seen. We do not see all round it. We are like Christian when he was climbing the hill Difficulty; we see the lions, but we do not see the chains which bind them. We can see the menace afar off, but we do not see the defensive grace until we get quite near. That is a very frequent experience. The temptation begins to loom before us, and we do not see a way of escape. The almost certain loss stares upon us, but we cannot see the provision for recovery. Apollyon straddles across the way, and we cannot see any sign of the promised Friend. The enemy seems to have done everything! Our Friend seems to have done nothing. And we shy! We halt! Perhaps we turn! And it is for just such emergencies that the great apostle gives us his counsel. "Do not be scared," he says. Forward! The threat is not the entire circumstance, as you will discover by continuing your journey! Keep quiet! Look straight ahead, and go on! When you get a little nearer you shall find that the lions are chained. There is cold water on this side the wall! There is the oil of inexhaustible grace on the other. "As thy day so shall thy strength be!" J. H. J.

"Learn of Me"

MONDAY, July 1. Matt. 11:29. "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Jesus Christ is the world's greatest Teacher. To learn of him, to follow him, sums up the duty of his disciples. To enter the school of Christ as a learner is to begin the Christian life. Conversion is practically a matriculation, an enlistment, a registration. To be sure, it is much more in its result, but it is this in its beginning.

What may we learn from Jesus? The very first lesson he teaches is that God exists and that God is no mere philosophical thought, no mental abstraction, but a Person who thinks, and thinks of us; who feels, and compassionates us in our need; who wills, and wills that we shall be holy. His second lesson touches life, its duties and its destiny. He spiritualizes the old commandments and gives us a new one—that we love one another. Another lesson we learn early in our experience as disciples concerns our relations to one another. We are members of the crew of the "good ship Earth." It is necessary not only that we obey the Commander but that we live on good terms with other members of the crew. Some of us have never yet fully learned how to adjust ourselves easily in our relations to other people. But since we are in Christ's school, and since our tuition never ends on earth, there is hope that we may yet learn not only how to make life pure and strong but how to make it peaceful and pleasant as well. The psalmist knew what are the lessons to be learned at the feet of the Master who wrote:

Here we learn to serve and give,
And rejoicing, self deny;
Here we gather love to live,
Here we gather faith to die.

Singing in Suffering

TUESDAY, July 2. Ps. 149:4, 5. "The Lord taketh pleasure in his people: he will beautify the meek with salvation. Let the saints be joyful in glory: let them sing aloud upon their beds." The saints of God who are here characterized as "meek" and lying upon their beds, are suffering saints. Their misfortunes have humbled them; the world is persecuting them, and thus they have become quite lowly, unpretentious people. Their beds may be their sick-beds or their dying-beds. To speak to such people of joy and glory, of beauty and singing, seems cruel mockery in a worldly view, but it describes exactly the spiritual condition of these people.

Can anything more uplifting and cheering be said to a human being than this, that the Lord takes pleasure in him? What is the favor of the greatest men on earth compared to the affection of God for a person? Men loathe the sight of a sufferer; they may cast him out from their company, as Lazarus was east out; but God views the patient struggles of these people like a general views the wrestling of his conquering army, with delight. Their tribulations are the test of their inward strength; they become heroes in their afflictions.

Yea, God beautifies them in their pain and sorrows; they become more saintly through their sufferings, firmer in their faith, more ardent in their hope, more tender and affectionate in their love of God and their fellow men. Their sufferings do not destroy them, but are bringing out in stronger outline the full scope of that salvation which God has prepared for them and which they behold coming on apace through all their suffering. Really their afflictions, believingly borne, become their glory; they surround them, as it were, with a halo. They sing to God amid their suffering, and drown their pains in their great joy and the anticipation of that great and final deliverance which God has promised them from all their griefs.

Jonah and Nineveh

WEDNESDAY, July 3. Jonah 4:10, 11. "Then said the Lord, Thou hast had pity on the gourd, . . . and should not I spare Nineveh?" Jonah refused to go to Nineveh because, knowing that God was merciful and kind, he feared the prodigal city would repent and be forgiven, and he, like the elder brother, would be invited to attend the festivities of rejoicing instead of the ruin. He had an eye upon his reputation as a prophet at Jerusalem, as well as upon Nineveh, which might conquer his own people if not destroyed. These considerations led him to flee from the Lord's call.

How true it is that the natural human heart hates enemies who are growing stronger and rejoices at their downfall! It is also a fact that the Jews believed that it was their mission to help overthrow Gentile and heathen people; therefore, the Pharisees hated Jesus for affiliating with publicans and sinners. Peter himself required a vision to convert him to the idea of the salvation of the Gentiles.

While Jonah waited for the result of his preaching, God prepared a gourd that its broad leaves might shade the prophet from the sun, and also a worm that, like an affliction, withered the gourd. Jonah had deep feeling for the death of the perishable gourd, but little for the one hundred and twenty thousand immortals in Nineveh.

We see here a lesson of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, long before Paul was commissioned to the Gentile world.

For the moment, Jonah, like Elijah, was so completely discouraged that death seemed the best way out of the difficulty. He dreaded to deal with a God of mercy, for he had not yet heard of prayer for enemies and blessings for those who despitely use you.

"Who Is My Neighbor?"

THURSDAY, July 4. Luke 10:37. "Go, and do thou likewise." The parables of the Prodigal Son and the Lost Sheep teach how dear man is to God. The parable of the Good Samaritan teaches how dear man should be to his fellow man. It was spoken in answer to a lawyer who asked Jesus, "Who is my neighbor?" The parable leaves us in no doubt as to the Christian doctrine of neighborship. He is our neighbor who sees our need and ministers to it. His nationality and his religion are no barrier to his love. Pure love overleaps all barriers of name and custom. An instance of such love, such Good Samaritanism, is in the case of that Jewish rabbi of Lyons, a chaplain in the French army, who held up a crucifix before the eyes of a dying Roman Catholic soldier who mistook the rabbi for a priest of his own faith.

Why did the priest of the parable pass by on the other side? Was he too busy to help a brother in distress? Had he official duties which forbade delay? Then he was in grievous error as to the comparative importance of religious observances and the exercise of mercy. Why did the Levite pass by on the other side? Was it the evil example of the priest that justified him in his indifference? Or was it that he saw another traveler approaching and acted upon the philosophy which in modern times has for its motto, "Let George do it"? Whatever may have been the cause of the priest's and Levite's dereliction in duty, there was one man who was not too busy to do good, one man to whom the voice of duty was the voice of God. Possibly the Good Samaritan did not attach any religious significance to his act, but Jesus does, and Jesus' words justify us in giving spiritual value to every deed which proceeds from "love out of a pure heart and of a good conscience and of faith unfeigned."

Jacob's Fear

FRIDAY, July 5. Gen. 28:16, 17. "Jacob awaked out of his sleep, and he said, Surely the Lord is in this place; and I knew it not. And he was afraid." The evening before Jacob had laid down for his night's rest in the open country near Luz, without the least misgiving regarding his personal safety in that lonely place. Though fleeing from the anger of his brother and hastening to a far country over roads which he had not traveled before, he seems not to have entertained any fear, when the night closed in upon him before he could reach a human dwelling. He seems to have trustfully confided his safekeeping in that lonely place during the night, which is said to be no man's friend, to his almighty and kind God, promptly to have fallen asleep and enjoyed the sound slumber of a young person after a fatiguing foot tour. Why, now, does fear seize him when he opens his eyes the next morning, sees the sun shining brightly, and beholds himself unharmed and strengthened sufficiently to resume his journey? And why does he say that he had not known that God was in that place? He had surely been taught by his pious parents to believe that God is everywhere, and the parting blessing with which his father Isaac had dismissed him had given him added assurance of Jehovah's particular interest in him.

Jacob's exclamation on awaking is to be understood as an expression of profound reverence; he had not foreseen when he went to sleep the night before that in this place that remarkable revelation would be made to him in his dream, which connected earth and heaven by a ladder on which he had seen the angels ascending and descending. He was studying this strange dream and was convinced that it must carry a deep meaning, which our Lord many years later explained to Nicodemus.

We gather from this incident proof that, while believers maintain a most intimate intercourse with their God through their confident trust in him and through prayer, this intimacy does not, like familiarity, breed contempt, but heightens their reverence for God, their reliance upon him, and their love for him. They behold with a joy that is tempered with awe how much closer God is to them than even their faith had represented him to be.

The Sinless One

SATURDAY, July 6. John 8:46. "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" Christ, the sinless Saviour, was not only the spotless Son of God, but he invites all humanity to come unto him and be made sinless like himself. He shed his blood for our cleansing. No other being ever dreamed of uttering such God-like words as Jesus did. He is not to be regarded as the greatest and holiest man of the ages, but the Only One, the divine One, the God-Man, who has all power in heaven and in earth—all the attributes of Almightyness. Is it not therefore natural to hear him say to those who thirst after the living God, "Come unto me and drink?" His being is the fountain of spiritual blessing. Whosoever is athirst, let him drink of him. Christ's death has brought the law of God, the love of God and lost manhood together in harmonious union.

But what will those do who will not accept the gift of God's love in the person of his Son? They will face eternal justice without a mediator who was bruised for their iniquities. Christ in us is our only hope of glory. "There is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus." We have not only forgiveness, but we have the Forgiver, yea, we have the Creator, the Judge, the Interpreter, the Counselor, the King, the Everlasting Father, and the Prince of Peace. It is no wonder that John wrote "the Word was God," or that Peter said, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God"; and all the world should exclaim with Thomas, "My Lord and my God!"

REV. DR. JOHN ROACH STRATON has accepted the pastorate of Calvary Baptist Church, New York, the old historic church whose past record has been made luminous by a long line of eminent preachers. A "recognition service" was held in the church on June 9, when addresses of welcome were delivered by the pastors of sister churches. There was a very large audience.

Will the Allies Intervene in Russia?

ON June 10 a Moscow dispatch declared that the power of the Bolshevik Soviets was being shaken throughout Russia, and that in several recent elections anti-Soviet deputies have been elected with large pluralities. It also appeared that the rumor of General Semenov's army having been defeated and broken up was contrary to the facts, General Semenov having driven back the Russian troops, although fighting against heavy odds. Dispatches from Amsterdam on June 10 quoted a statement of the German Imperial Vice-Chancellor Von Payer, in which he outlined a great commercial union of central Europe, which should have a single foreign policy, although retaining the political independence of the empires concerned. Such a group Von Payer held would be invincible, and would control the peace of Europe. He included in his invincible group Germany, with her present allies; Poland, the Ukraine, Finland, and a reconstituted Russia. On June 10 also Senator King of Utah introduced a resolution in the Senate, proposing that a commission be sent to Russia backed by an Allied military force for the purpose of overcoming German propaganda, and to aid in giving freedom to Russia. On June 11 Boris Bakhmeteff, ambassador of the Kerensky government at Washington, presented to the American State Department a resolution adopted unanimously by the central committee of the Cadet or Constitutional party, which has opposed the Bolsheviks ever since the coup by which Lenin and Trotsky seized the power of the Russian democracy. The resolution pleaded for Allied aid and stated that the Cadets had never recognized the Brest-Litovsk peace, that the Germans were continually seizing new regions of Russia, and that there seemed to be no limit to such occupation. It was understood the Social Revolutionists were in sympathy with the Cadet appeal. On June 12 Arthur J. Balfour, British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, declared in the House of Commons that there was no truth in the report that America and the Allies had agreed not to intervene in Russian affairs, and it was suggested that Japan would soon issue a proclamation defining her attitude toward Russia. Meantime Germany was going ahead with the Germanization of Russia, and many Entente diplomats were convinced that unless counter-measures were taken Germany by next spring will have gained such a grip upon Russia that she will be able to impress Russian soldiers into her army and send them to the western front to continue the battle in which she is now recklessly spending her own men. President Wilson was reported on June 12 as being still unconvinced of the wisdom of Allied military intervention in Russia.

A Week in the World's News

AUSTRIA THREATENS SUBJECT PEOPLES. The Russian Soviet government is having considerable trouble in attempting to disarm 150,000 Czechoslovak troops who deserted from Austria in order to fight with the Russian army, and who were on June 12 reported as seeking to leave Russia by way of Siberia in order to join the Allies on the western front. Austria had threatened war on what is left of Russia if these troops were permitted to leave Russian territory. At last reports over 1,250 miles of the Trans-Siberian Railroad was reported as under the control of the former Austrian troops who were being joined by Don Cossacks and who were halting all food stuffs consigned to Soviet Russia. Austria has also placarded all the cities of the Dual Monarchy with notices declaring that the government is cognizant of the revolutionary plans of the Czechoslovaks, and that any attempted uprisings will be suppressed with military force.

U-BOATS STILL OFF OUR COAST. German submarines on June 10 sank two Norwegian steamers: the Vindeggen, of 2,632 tons, and the Henrick Lund, of 4,322 tons, about 100 miles east of Cape Charles, Md. The Vindeggen was loaded with copper, and the submarine commander shifted 80 tons of the cargo to the hold of the submarine before sinking the vessel. Two more Norwegian but the sinking was not officially reported.

POOL RESOURCES TO WIN WAR. It was announced on June 12 that all of the economic resources of the United States and the Allies would be welded into one vast machine to be operated by a Munitions Council, with headquarters in one of the Entente capitals. The Council would have complete authority for the control, purchase, and distribution of food, raw material, and finished products needed by the Allies; under its direction a great deal of lost motion would be eliminated, and a great deal of moving of supplies, now required by changing situations, made unnecessary, while all plants would be kept running at top capacity on the material most urgently needed. Within the United

PRESIDENT WILSON REASSURES LATIN AMERICA. As a means of combating German propaganda in Mexico, the committee on Public Information brought to Washington twenty-one of the leading newspaper editors of our Southern neighbor. President Wilson, addressing them on June 7, assured them that America had no intention of dictating to Mexico, or of interfering in her internal affairs. He declared that America was the champion of the nations who had no military standing. He called attention to his proposal for a Pan-American agreement. He recognized the fact that while in the Monroe Doctrine America had declared herself a big brother of the nations to the South, she had done it without asking their advice, and that now he proposed that all the American nations sign a declaration of political independence and of territorial integrity, agreeing that if any one, the United States included, should violate the territory of one of the others, all the rest would jump on that one. He declared that such an agreement of the two continents of America would show the way to peace to the rest of the world, and he declared that peace could only come by trust. This speech was enthusiastically received by the Mexican editors, and according to dispatches from various sources made a very good impression throughout the Americas, being printed prominently by most of the Mexican papers, and being widely distributed throughout Mexico by telegraph and mail.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Up to the middle of June Norway had experienced a complete drought for two months. Crops were reported to have suffered greatly, and famine to appear inevitable. In the last 6 months the War Department spent $25,177,417 in additions and improvements to army hospitals. . . . President Wilson on June 11 sent a telegram to the American Federation of Labor in convention at St. Paul, congratulating organized labor on the patriotic support which its members had given to the nation in the trenches, on the battlefield, and in the shops. . . . Henry Ford appears in danger of becoming a senator, having been nominated by the Democrats of Michigan, and being mentioned as a possible candidate of the Republicans. He is reported as willing to serve the nation as a senator if the people wish it. . . . The Food Administration, on June 12, asked the American people to reduce their use of beef in the home to not more than 1 1/4 pounds of clear beef weekly per person. Restaurants and hotels were also restricted as to the use of beef. It is recommended that pork be used freely. . . . Peru, on June 14, seized the German vessels interned in her ports, the tonnage involved being nearly 50,000, 260,000 tons in the ports of Argentina and Chile may also be seized. . . . The registration of June 5 added 744,765 men to the number available for military service. Men married since the passage of the draft act, May 18, 1917, will be reclassified in Class I unless they have children. . . . President Wilson on June 14, sent letters to the heads of the Western Union and Postal telegraph companies, urging them to accept the settlement of their labor question proposed by the War Labor Board. This would involve recognition of the right of the

June 28 has been designated by President Wilson and Secretary McAdoo as National War Savings Day. On or before that day all of the people are asked to pledge themselves to practice personal saving and economy, and to invest in War Savings Stamps. The war must be financed as largely as possible out of savings. Everything that we do without relieves a machine or a man somewhere to make something the government needs. The price of the thing we do without, invested in War Savings Stamps, helps to buy the product of the man or the machine. Thrift and economy, always wise, are now the twin peaks of patriotism.

ships were sunk on June 14, the bark Krinsjaa and the bark Samoa.

Two British ships, reaching an Atlantic port on June 11, reported the sinking of submarines on their west-bound trip. Another British steamer encountered a submarine 250 miles off the New Jersey coast just at dusk, but escaped although pursued.

There was a rumor that one of the American patrol boats operating off the coast had engaged a submarine, had forced it to submerge, and had dropped depth bombs, which reached their mark. The engagement was confirmed.

States also industries engaged in war work are not to be held in the restricted area of the East, but the new plants to be established will be in the West and South. All the industries of the Union capable of doing war work are to be included in a great unified plan of control.

"It Is More Blessed to Give"

NOW and then a hungry soul seeks in giving the rest that never comes with getting. Hearts closed by having are often opened by sharing, and paths blocked by selfish purposes are frequently cleared by sympathy. Jean Mahan Plank in "The Gift of the Receiver," next week's story, shows how all of these may be. More than that, she brings a happy ending to a quest of years. Romance? Of course, but that is life.

Dr. Jowett, in the pulpit next week, points to the Perils of Power, and shows the way to safety.

Four thousand overcoats a day! Only a trifle, the product of one plant, a clothing plant of course. Frank Carpenter has been through these plants where goods and buttons and labor are combined into uniforms. He lets us all into the place next week.

The Neighbors have a patriotic session next week, also Miss Sangster sings a song to the flag—our flag—that is above every flag.

How Uncle Sam Treats His Enemies

By
NEVIN O. WINTER

HOW will two thousand men spend their time when penned up and having nothing to do? This was the great human interest question that concerned me in visiting the Hot Springs internment camp, where twenty-three hundred officers and sailors from the German steamers, together with a small number of civilians, are kept in confinement. It helps to answer the question how Americans interned in Germany may pass their time if allowed the same privileges as are here granted to enemy aliens who the government considers should not be given complete liberty.

Interned prisoners are entitled to different treatment from prisoners of war. They may not be put to work, while prisoners of war may be compelled to labor in certain employments, none of which shall have a direct connection with the military departments. Most of the interned prisoners at Hot Springs are from the great transatlantic merchant liners that formerly plied between German and American ports.

When war broke out between the two countries our government leased the splendid hotel at Hot Springs, which is located in a beautiful valley in one of the most charming places in the mountains of western North Carolina. It is about thirty miles northwest of Asheville. The new buildings erected are long and narrow, after the style in the cantonments. There is nothing luxurious about them, for the arrangement is as simple as the architecture. Even in the hotel three are bunked in each room. The bath-houses are provided with an abundance of hot and cold water, and the prisoners have an opportunity to keep clean. There are two camps at Hot Springs, one for the officers from the captains down to mates, and the other for the men before the masts, stokers, etc.

ENFORCED idleness is probably the worst punishment the average man can have inflicted on him. And so it is with these Germans. Whatever their faults, they are not idlers. Many indeed are the ways in which they employ their leisure time. There are two men who may be seen around the enclosure at most any time with a net for catching butterflies. These specimens are carefully mounted in albums, and in such a methodical and tasteful way as to be most attractive. They have made a study of these little creatures which abound there among the mountains, until they have become real authorities upon the subject. Another man is an adept at carving, so he has carved in boxwood an exact replica of the hotel which is the principal part of the officers' camp.

Gardening is a favorite occupation, and every available space permitted by the authorities has been utilized. The individual gardens are very small. But if a man has a little patch no more than eight by ten it is banked up and neatly divided into several sections. There will surely be a little bed of lettuce, a few short rows of onions and other vegetables. There will probably be a few flowers, and in a few instances there are more flowers than vegetables. It is surprising the amount of time a man will spend on this diminutive garden. Several times a day he may be seen at work with it. He works the dirt over, carries water to sprinkle it, and cares for it almost as carefully as if it were human. While passing through the hotel in company with the inspector, a tall, dignified German, a ship captain, stopped the official and said in very good English:

"Inspector, will you tell those men and the three meals furnished by the government do not quite seem to satisfy. A merry-go-round has been built which shows a great deal of ingenuity. It will really run, and the price I understood to be one cent. It is run by man power.

The most elaborate building of the entire camp is a church with a tall spire in Camp A, which had just been completed. It was a complete church in miniature, with altar and half a dozen or more stiff pews, such as one will find in a German church in the Fatherland. It was practically finished except the

A street of rustic shelters, fairyland within a prison, built by the sailmen. Camp A and its partly finished church who live over me not to throw things down on my garden? [directly under his window]. They throw things there and then the rats run over my garden and destroy it."

This shows to what small matters one's attention will be directed when the greater ones are forbidden or become impossible.

A few of the prisoners have chickens and take great delight in raising the young ones. There are also a few rabbit fanciers. There is quite a colony of pets, which includes dogs, cats, and even a parrot or two. All of these things are done and maintained wholly at the expense of the prisoners.

These men receive remittances every month or two from the steamship companies through the Swiss consul, so that they always have money for their wants, since the food is all furnished them by our government.

IN each camp a little German village has been constructed. The Germans seem to crave a little privacy, so that several will go together and purchase the necessary material and do the work of construction. Much of the work is artistically done, so that there are Swiss chalets, and reproductions of a number of different styles of German homes. There are two or three little houses of rustic construction that are real gems and would ornament any one's lawn. In these little houses the prisoners spend the greater part of their time. In two or three I noticed small home-constructed stoves on which they could boil coffee and fry an egg for lunch. These Germans have good appetites, painting. It was really a little gem. The roof was of tin, painted red, and was made of scraps of tin that had been picked up.

In fact, much of the village had been built of wood left along the bank by the flood waters of the French Broad River. Along its banks many other little rest houses of a simpler style had been constructed, in which the men love to spend their time.

Athletic games of a number of kinds are indulged in, and boxing is quite a favorite diversion among the younger members of the camps. A game very popular is fist-ball, in which a ball is batted to and fro over a net with the closed fist. The sailors have a recreation enclosure which is open from sunrise to sunset, and hundreds of miles are tramped here every day by these sailors, most of whom wear wooden-soled shoes that are made in the camp.

The Y. M. C. A. has a building in Camp B, as the sailors' camp is called. Here a number of study classes are conducted, with the interned officers as the teachers. A few are studying English, but not many. There is one class in German. The most popular language is Spanish, as the men seem to feel that the most likely place for German trade after the war will be with the Spanish republics. The secretary in charge informed me that it has been impossible to interest the camp in religious work of any kind. Moving pictures are shown frequently at a very small charge and are greatly enjoyed. The men frequently get up theatrical entertainments of their own.

THAT Uncle Sam is doing his duty toward these people of an enemy country which has been guilty of so much cruelty and so many inhuman acts is only what we might expect. The only criticism which might be offered is that he possibly overdoes it. Every courtesy is extended to those men that discipline permits. They are given the very best of food and in abundant quantity. The food is all prepared by German cooks who have been taken from the interned steamships, and they are among the best. They are allowed to prepare the food furnished them their own way. The kitchens are run in a business-like way with very little waste. Those who work about the camp and in the kitchen are paid twenty dollars per month by the government. In the sailor camp the men provide their own service, taking their turns at this work, but in the officers' camp the waiters, who are Germans, are paid by the government.

NOT so many liberties are allowed these interned prisoners as formerly. It was found that advantage was being taken and some plots were discovered, so that many privileges were cut off. One of these was the privilege of seeing their families. More than thirty women, wives of officers, and more than that number of children are living in Hot Springs. Many of these have lived in the United States for years.

When the camp was first established, the men were allowed a short visit once each week. Now they are not allowed even to exchange words. Every afternoon that the weather permits the women and children walk by and cross the bridge to the other side of the river. This might be called the Bridge of Sighs, for they are near to their loved ones, being separated only by a barbed-wire obstacle, while guards with rifles watch them from the elevated sentry boxes. On the opposite bank of the river the women and children sit for hours, but they can simply look at each other. Waving is forbidden, for it was found that a wig-wag system of communication had been evolved. Each can write a letter once each week, which passes through the hands of the camp censor.

There are some near-tragedies among the enemy alien civilians interned here. While I was at Hot Springs, fifty German subjects were brought from the Philippines. These were Germans who had lived in the islands for years. It was impossible for them to become American subjects without coming back to the United States. A son of one of them could not speak German, and he had served in the American army in the Philippines. He even wanted to enlist in the American army against Germany, but could not be accepted. Nevertheless he and his father were both interned. The mother and sister were taken to a camp in Pennsylvania.

A visit to the Hot Springs Internment Camp proves that Uncle Sam is fighting this war with clean hands in championing the cause of humanity.

The Prayer of Faith

TO Christian minds everywhere, and especially to all earnest believers in the efficacy of prayer, there is great encouragement in the fact, which is becoming more and more evident, that the power of prayer is finding wider acceptance than heretofore. In all of the Allied nations, the exhortation to individual and united appeal for divine guidance and for blessing on our efforts in the war, is now almost universally followed. In our own land, belief in the prayer of faith has become so general that we find it among all denominations. This growing spirit of confidence in supplication we note also in innumerable little gatherings of Christian men and women who have banded themselves together as circles of intercession to present the cause of justice and righteousness at the throne of grace daily; indeed, there are doubtless very many who, in this period of world-trial, literally "pray without ceasing." We have come to be, in the truest sense of the term, a praying nation.

These are times in which prayer should be the very life of the churches. In many cities, one may hear the church bells ringing at every weekday noon as the signal for passers-by to pause and offer up their silent petitions in behalf of the nation and its Allies, and for the triumph of the just cause for which we are heroically fighting. God is not on the side of the heaviest battalions, but of the praying hosts, for he hath said: "My glory I will not give to another," and "If ye ask . . . I will do." He has assured those who trust in him that "every one that asketh receiveth," if we ask in faith and according to his will. His promise is the promise of Omnipotence.

Even amid all the smoke and turmoil and ghastly welter of war, brave hearts, fighting for righteousness and freedom, are stimulated by the conviction that a new and better civilization is to come out of it all. Nothing of real worth is accomplished except through sacrifice, and those at the front, as well as we at home, are strengthened by the knowledge that America's sacrifice is sanctified through its unselfishness. It has been ours to set an example that has stirred the nations deeply, and led them to look forward to the creation of a new spirit in international friendships and to such a unity of nations in the bonds of Christian brotherhood as the world has never known in the past.

That eminent religious leader, Professor Cairns, expresses in a single sentence the spirit which prevails at the front today, when he writes that they are giving their lives "that Christ may have dominion over our whole international life." With such a spirit in evidence, with the courage that comes from supreme confidence in the divine justice, and with the reinforcement of ceaseless intercession, rising from the hearts and lips of devoted Christians in all lands, we can go forward to the end with unwavering confidence that He will give us the ultimate victory.

A Tribute Worth Having

WHEN Mr. John R. Mott is on the platform, he invariably brings a message that is worth while. During a recent gathering of the National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A., in New York, he told of his experiences in the warring countries of Europe, and incidentally gave his impressions of the character of the American army. Speaking from intimate knowledge of the subject, he said:

I know that army. Moreover, since this war began I have seen every other great army on both sides of this struggle, and have seen them intimately. There has gone forth to those European shores, or risen up in those European islands and on the European continent, no body of men averaging as high, as judged by every test, as this army of American young men—the flower of the manhood and the boyhood of this republic.

I was having luncheon with General Pershing, and with great eagerness he ventured to say that in his judgment not in the history of mankind has there been a body of men averaging higher in personality and character going forward on a more important errand and animated by purer motives or higher principles. I wish the whole American people could have looked into his eyes and have heard his vibrating voice, as he spoke with such intimate knowledge and conviction.

I was talking with General Edwards, one of our generals overseas, and asking him to explain why it was that our young soldiers, not acquainted with war, had conducted themselves so splendidly as they had. Just the hour while we were in his office I heard the report how they had been caught between the barrage of the enemy and our own, through some mistake, and they had been punished for hours without being caused to waver. I said, "General, how do you explain it all?" He reflected a moment and gave this answer, which I shall ever treasure: "Mr. Mott, I trace it to the tradition of the American mother."

What a splendid answer! Who can measure the anchoring, the conserving, the inspiring power of American mothers as now being evidenced under the impossible strain of this war?

These testimonies from such high sources confirm what we have already learned from Y. M. C. A. workers, chaplains and correspondents. And Mr. Mott gives substantially the same appreciative report of the men of our navy. He reminds us, too, of the amazing growth of the United States as a naval power. When the war opened, we had somewhere about 200 naval vessels of all classes; now they number 1,450 and he believes will reach 1,900 before the year's end. Our naval man-power has risen from 70,000 to 400,000.

It is not surprising that he should regard the spiritual care of our great and constantly growing army and navy as a "colossal burden of responsibility" for those organizations to which the nation has assigned the duty of looking after their moral and spiritual welfare. Truly the Red Cross and the Red Triangle are facing the greatest tests they have ever known. To men of many nationalities and in many lands they are today giving splendid aid through a gospel of cheer and practical helpfulness. Their workers are found everywhere in the trenches, the prison camps and the hospitals, and their kindly and efficient ministry is always welcomed. These brave and self-sacrificing workers deserve the fullest support from the people of this nation, and there is no American who is not debtor for their service.

Child Labor Law Must Be Made Over

THE decision of the United States Supreme Court, rendering void the national Child Labor Law, proves only that the law as framed, and not the principle back of it, is defective.

A better law that will stand the strictest test must be put in its place. This will not be difficult nor long delayed, for not only is the principle right but it is popular. Protection of the young child against debilitating and debasing employment is unmistakably demanded by the better sense of the nation. Indeed, most of the states already have their own very effective laws.

What the United States is going to do toward the conservation of its children is one of the most important questions that can be asked, for, no matter how great its institutions, how victorious its troops, any nation which allows its children to be sacrificed dies. War, historically, bears hardest on the little ones. Every food famine, every fuel blockade and every industrial depression hits them first and hardest.

The one argument in favor of child labor is need of family income. This at its best means sacrifice of the little ones' youth, health, happiness and opportunity, for the aid of the parents—an idea that is abhorrent. It conflicts with the sacred rights of the child and with the welfare of society. Such a course can only mean a continuance of immorality, neurasthenia or defeated existence in one form or another from generation to generation, and the nation that does not take up the responsibility can only end in national decay.

Able minds are at work on a new national Child Labor Law that will conform to the Constitution, to the popular demand and to the highest rights of the children.

Making Young Hearts Glad

SINCE the gates of Mont-Lawn were first opened twenty-five years ago, 45,237 children have passed that happy portal and spent a summer outing of ten long, glorious days of unalloyed delight. Our "Children's Paradise," from small beginnings, has now attained a nation-wide fame. It has friends and patrons in every state, who, through all these years, have contributed to its welfare, and the generosity of those friends—who have been the real builders of Mont-Lawn—has endeared them to us all. The beautiful Home, with its picturesque surroundings and complete equipment, is an enduring monument to the golden-hearted men and women who, under the leadership of Dr. Klopseh, have given such practical interpretation to the Master's words: "Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Mont-Lawn this week will welcome its first contingent of little guests for the season. They come from homes of poverty in the great city, for Mont-Lawn's doors only open to those who have no hope or expectation of a holiday elsewhere. Many of the little folk who came in the early days, and who learned to love the patriotic songs of the "Children's Paradise," are now serving their country in the army and navy, the Red Cross and in other ways. Wherever they are in these June days, many of them will doubtless recall pleasant memories of the joyous, healthgiving summers they spent among the Rockland woods and hills.

Every member of the Christian Herald family is entitled to a share in this beautiful work for the children. There is nothing that can add more real zest and enjoyment to your own summer holiday than the knowledge that you have been the means of giving a fresh air outing to some poor child. We hope that on this twenty-fifth anniversary summer, Mont-Lawn will not be forgotten.

Submarines and Our Shipping

IN spite of the enemy submarines, American shipping is surely and swiftly building a safe bridge to France.

Chairman Hurley of the Shipping Board supplies some impressive facts.

While on July 1, 1916, we had under the flag 2,412,000 tons of shipping, but 500,000 tons were engaged in foreign ocean traffic. There were "American products ready to go anywhere, but American ships nowhere." By June 1 of this year "we had increased the American-built tonnage to over 3,500,000 dead-weight tons." In eleven months we had built as much as in the entire previous four years.

In ten months 1,000,000 tons of new ships have been added, besides 730,176 tons of German and Austrian bottoms seized under war powers, 526,532 tons requisitioned from Holland and 953,661 tons chartered from other neutral countries. In all, 7,000,000 tons now fly the flag, including indispensable lake carriers.

What is even more to the point, the increase in construction is swiftest now. We built in May alone more shipping than in the entire year 1915. Mr. Hurley sees ahead a shipping program of 14,715,000 tons; and by 1920, 1,000,000 men at work in yards and allied trades—there are 550,000 now—and a total fleet of 25,000,000 tons, far surpassing that of any other nation at any period in history.

The submarines, instead of being a real obstacle, are proving to be the greatest possible incentive to American shipping activity.

Work for Soldiers After War

THE gigantic problem of turning millions of fighters back to peaceful pursuits without disturbing the labor market, without creating a tremendous industrial upheaval and without causing a disastrous downward revision of labor wages is today receiving the attention of the foremost thinkers of modern times. These farsighted men and women see the necessity for immediate adoption of some plan whereby each honorably discharged soldier, sailor or marine will be assured a suitable opportunity to earn a livelihood for himself and his dependents.

Much attention has been given in all the nations at war to the returned disabled fighter, so that today each who still retains a spark of life is assured a chance to support himself. He will receive proper training by the government and private agencies, and an outlet for his energies is guaranteed. But the disabled man will be of a great minority. Those who will really need aid will be the men who come out of this war without serious injuries.

England has realized the importance of making some provision for their future and has formed a Parliamentary Committee and a Ministry of Reconstruction to deal with this problem.

There is now in the hands of the United States Secretary of Commerce and Labor a proposal which will guarantee every man a chance with those who stayed behind.

Secretary Lane has submitted to the President and the people a plan for opening millions of acres of land to our home-coming soldiers. He points out that we have arid lands in the West; cut-over lands in the Northwest, Lake States, and South; and also swamp lands in the Middle West and South, which can be made available through the proper development. The arid land will require water, the cut-over land will require clearing, and the swamp land must be drained. Plans and investigations have been under way for some time, and it has been officially estimated that more than fifteen millions of acres of irrigable land now remain in the government's hands.

The nation will owe an incalculable debt to its returning defenders. The very least the nation can give them is justice.

Pleasure makes a good sauce, but a mighty poor meal. Education is like the edge we put on the ax—only valuable if we chop in the right place.

My Log From New York to Cape Town

By MAJOR THEODORE WATERS

MAJOR WATERS' diary of his long sea journey from New York to Palestine, written primarily for his associates, gives such a vivid description of his ocean trip in war time that we feel impelled to share it with our readers. He is a member of the Red Cross Commission to Palestine, which sailed from New York in March.

Thursday, March 14.
Up at seven A.M. Found vessel leaving dock. Last view of New York. Breakfast. Lascars wait on table. They look quaint in their Indian costume. One of them goes about in his bare feet.

Exercised and drilled on deck. Vessel, off Long Branch, turned back for repairs to steam pipes. Came to off Bay Ridge and lay to while repairs were made. Started again in early afternoon, this time off for good. My trunk, containing necessities, was by mistake placed in baggage room. Am getting dirtier by the minute. Squeamish also. Many have not attended evening meal. Wonder why!

Everybody got inoculated tonight for typhoid. I prepared to give three rousing screams and waited for the doctor to jab me in the arm. When I opened my eyes to find out why he did not begin, I found he had finished.

Friday, March 15.
9 A.M. Took a lesson in Arabic. Learned to say "How do you do?"

10 A.M. Took a lesson in French. I got them mixed, and effect is weird.

Got my trunk and am now clean.
Had concert in music room tonight.

Saturday, March 16.
The Lascar brought tea and biscuit (cake) and an apple to my berth at six A.M. as usual. I wanted to throw them at him, but thought better of it and ate them. But I don't like him to "sneak up" on me in the dark.

7:30, drilled. 8 A.M., breakfast. 9 A.M. Arabic, 10, French. 12 M., dinner. 2:30, lecture by Rev. Jago on Palestine. 3:30, tea. 5 P.M., lifeboat drill. 5:30, drill, drill. 6 P.M. high tea. 7, lecture by Colonel Ward. 8, looked at the new moon and wished I were home. 10, going to bed.

Sunday, March 17.
No drill, no French, no Arabic, no games. Services at 10:30 A.M. Everybody attended. Services in the afternoon. Services at night. Nothing else. "Pulled through."

Monday, March 18.
It is wonderful how blue the water is. Even close to the side of the vessel, it is as though all the wash-women of the whole world had emptied their blueing tubs overside. They tell me the Mediterranean is bluer. It may be, but it doesn't seem possible. The sea is covered with flying-fish. They are mostly small ones, that look white and glistening in the sunlight. But a fairly large one flew on board today. It was white beneath and dark above, and had quite a spread of wings. They make me think of "Mandalay."

This trip is doing me good. I am thinner, but I feel like writing all the time, and that's a good sign.

Tuesday, March 19.
The only thing that stands out of the routine of the day is the typhoid and smallpox they've given me. We are to get typhus and cholera later, so that presently I will be full of several of our well-known diseases.

Wednesday, March 20.
Nothing but routine and an itching arm.

Thursday, March 21.
We are approaching Castries, on the Island of St. Lucia, West Indies. Martinique lies off to the right. We can see Mont Pelée plainly. Castries is a picturesque town, lying at the far end of a beautiful bay surrounded by cottage-dotted hills. As we draw up to the dock, a dozen or more native boys swim around the steamer, begging for pennies, for which they dive. They call constantly, "Here, Sar!" "Penny, Sar!" and they almost never lose the coin when it is thrown.

P.M. Allowed to go on shore. We went to the consul's office and cabled home. Then we explored the town. The people are blacks and speak a French patois. The vessel is being coaled by native women, who carry the coal in baskets on their heads. They are clothed in rags, but how they keep them on is a mystery. The old ones smoke pipes and they all jabber and quarrel at a great rate, with frequent bursts of laughter. The place has a large Catholic cathedral, attended mostly by natives. In the afternoon a few of us rowed over to the English garrison across the bay, and were entertained by the commandant, Major Harris. We had tea.

We are to have an entertainment on deck tonight and Major Harris's party is to visit us.

Friday, March 22.
Last night there was an entertainment and the English military party attended. Major Harris was very happy. He called our ship the "lucky boat," because in its mail he received a commission making him a Lieutenant-Colonel.

The entertainment part of the program slipped a cog because the actor passengers (there are a number) refused to play. They have some grievance against us. Wonder what it is? But the evening passed pleasantly just the same.

Went on shore again this morning and mailed some post-cards to the children.

The ship sailed around noon, and as we drew away from the dock, the boys were in the water again calling out "Penny, Sar!" and diving in the water for those that were thrown. They accompanied us a long way from the dock, and at last put off for shore, singing "I'm a Yankee Doodle Dandy" à la George Cohan. It was in broken French-Negro-English and one of the funniest mixtures of song I ever heard. As we passed the Garrison hill, Colonel Harris signaled with the flag "Pleasant voyage."

As evening falls we can just see the outline of the island of St. Vincent far off to starboard.

Saturday, March 23.
This has been a day of recovery from the dissipations of St. Lucia.

I was delegated to find out what was the matter with the actresses and actors. I was told that they were peeved because some one had thrown a lot of religious tracts through the railed opening in the music-room floor down to the dining-room. One of the tracts about the conversion of an actress fell right on an actress's plate. Business of indignation. Hence, no business of entertaining at Castries.

Further investigation shows that some one had placed the tracts on a table in the music-room. Then some one opened a window, whereat the wind blew them through the opening down into the dining-room. There was only one tract among the lot that referred to an actress, but that was the one that fell on the actress's plate. Now we are a happy family again.

After dinner tonight we were all inoculated again against typhoid. Last time we were given 500,000,000 dead germs. Tonight we took in a double dose—one billion. Looks like tonight's the night!

Sunday, March 24.
I SAID it. This is the end of an imperfect day. I missed four distinct religious services on account of a mere billion germs! I do not believe they all agreed on the proper course to take, when they were let loose in my midst. Furthermore, it is futile to insist that they are dead germs. I have inside information to the contrary. I was not able to attend morning services, and much against my will I was compelled to lie around all day. There is no germ theory of disease; it is a ribald fact.

And they tell us we shall have to import a few more billion of these dead ones before we disembark. To console me, they tell me my vaccination is a "beautiful take." Sure; beautiful as a beefsteak and the biggest on board.

Monday, March 25.
I am still a sick man. I escaped drill, of course, because my arm ached so, but I rather like the callisthenics, so I am not pleased.

Tuesday, March 26.
Very much better today. They are proposing to get up an entertainment for tomorrow night and have asked me to help. Uncle Tom's Cabin. It was thought would about fit. Captain Greniger, the biggest man on board, was to be "Little Eva."

Wednesday, March 27.
The day has come and gone. The play was a howling success, especially "Little Eva," who kept the audience in screams of laughter. "Simon Legree" did very well, especially when he brought in his bloodhounds (three young men, who strained at their leash and barked) Eliza escaped across the river on blocks of ice (soap boxes) and when Legree dashed after her, she "foiled" him by picking up pieces of ice and carrying them with her as she went along. Of course he couldn't cross the "open" water. Eva's death was a sad affair (she died of inoculations and vaccinations). Everybody said the dogs were wonderful, but some thought they had not adequate support.

Friday, March 29.
Great excitement today. About three in the afternoon a big vessel appeared over the horizon off our port quarter. As soon as she saw us she began to belch smoke and, strangely enough, crowded on all sail, and she carried a lot of it for a steamer. Of course our captain immediately changed our course, so as to make it a stern chase, and ordered forced steam ahead. That she was a raider every one felt sure, particularly as she stood very high out of the water, showing that she was not loaded. And every steamer is loaded to the rails nowadays, no matter which way it is going. We watched her through our glasses, wondering what would become of us if we were caught. And after a while it was evident we were gaining on her, and presently she took in her sails and altered her course to the right, which carried her across our stern and far down on the starboard horizon. The officers said it was a narrow squeak. As these vessels frequently operate in pairs, port-holes are being kept very tightly closed tonight.

Communion services were held in the music-room this evening.

Saturday, March 30.
This has been an ordinary day. Drills and Arabic, French and drills.

Lecture on Women and Children of the East by Miss Metheny at 2:30 P.M. Very interesting. Expect to cross the equator tonight. Evening. It is raining violently.

Easter Sunday, March 31.
HAD a very fine Easter service in the music room this morning. While we were piously engaged, a big steamer appeared over the horizon and came toward us. The captain left the room to ascertain about her, but we had to stick, and wonder just how she was coming, for we could not see. After much prayer, church let out and we got our glasses to see the steamer. She was a big one and high out of the water. It proved a false alarm, however, as she soon turned across our stern and disappeared over the horizon.

We crossed the equator at four o'clock this morning. Some of the passengers thought they heard a distinct scrape as the bottom of the ship passed over, but as they had been sitting up all night waiting for it, I can not be certain. Yesterday it was spring, today it is fall. Funny what a difference just a few hours make.

Monday, April 1.
Very little doing today. The doctors fooled us for once. They did not inoculate us.

Tuesday, April 2.
Fooled again. They did inoculate us today.

Friday, April 5.
This afternoon we passed St. Helena. True, it was over thirty miles away, and we could just see the top of the high hills; but everybody seemed impressed with the sight of the place where Napoleon passed his last days. For the last six years of his life all he could see was what we see—clouds and sea, with the horizon between. And this after a life of supreme power!

In the evening we listened to the reading of a poem by the English poet, Noyes, describing the death-bed musings and ravings of Bonaparte. It was well read, but it left every one sad.

I have been standing by the rail this evening, looking at the Dipper, which is far down on the northern horizon. I suppose Napoleon used to do this while he thought of his lost greatness. But I am thinking of my own dear one and the kiddies at home.

Tuesday, April 9.
Yes, I saw my first albatross this morning. It was a small one to be sure, but it carried us back to the "Rime of the Ancient Mariner." Later in the day bigger birds flew over.

Wednesday, April 10.
My birthday and thousands of miles from home. Promises to be lonely. Wrong again. The day was ordinary except as to the weather, which was extraordinarily fine. At supper, the colonel read order No. 23, which was an injunction to the members of the party to devote the evening to doing honor to one, Major Theodore Waters, who was brought into this world, obviously without being consulted, on April 10, to these many years ago. I had not mentioned the fact, but they got it from the ship's papers. It was a great surprise to me, particularly when the East Indian stewards marched in, twenty of them, bearing aloft a huge cake decorated with the flags of the Allies, the Red Cross flag in the center. They held the cake high above their heads and made the circuit of the room, finally depositing it on a table by my side. I was somewhat flabbergasted, and in the middle of it I had to make a speech. I told them I felt like the nigger who was about to be hanged and when asked if he had anything to say merely remarked that the event was certainly going to be a lesson to him. When we came to eat the cake, I bit on something hard and found that they had stolen one of my oak leaves and had it baked in the cake.

Later in the evening some of the ship's officers entertained me. Funny what a lot of nice people there are in this world after all!

Thursday, April 11.
Nearing Cape Town. Hope to see land any minute. Land ho! Table Mountain is in sight.

"Higher Than Your Ways"

By
L. D. STEARNS

MRS. SEAVER tapped lightly at the door of her husband's study. Then, without waiting for an answer, she pushed it wide and entered.

"I'm sorry to disturb you, John," she apologized, "but the groceries are here, and I haven't a solitary cent."

Absently dipping into his pocket, the minister brought forth a handful of loose coins. "How much, Ellen?" he inquired mechanically.

"A dollar fifteen," Leaning forward, she picked out the change. "Poor dear," she murmured, and for an instant her lips touched his graying hair. "I've told Hannah she could go at the end of the week. That'll help quite a bit."

"You're looking tired," he frowned. Then his shoulders lifted, and straightened. "When you've settled that bill," he said, "I wish you'd come back. I've something to talk over with you."

"All right, dear." Turning, she hurried from the room.

Disposing of the groceries, she pulled a kettle farther back on the stove and took a hurried look into the oven. Then she hastened to the sitting-room and dusted tables, shelf and piano; for morning callers were by no means unknown. "I wonder," she mused, shaking the duster, "what John has on his mind now."

In a corner of the yard Dorothy was sitting under an old tree, chatting with Elizabeth Graves. Dorothy was seventeen, and reveling in summer vacation. Esther, home from her first year of teaching, was busily sewing nearby on a new gown. Between them Donald, aged twelve, blissfully happy in the arrival of the last "American Boy," was stretched full length on the grass, lost to all sense of sight or sound.

Turning, Mrs. Seaver made her way to the study.

"I knew you'd have to see to the affairs of the nation," the minister announced as she entered: "so I got in a ten-minute nap." He yawned: then his glance strayed across the yard and over the open space ahead, out to where the edge of sky dipped to meet hills and trees beyond. "Ellen," he confessed thoughtfully, "I'm beset with anxiety. You need Hannah, now, if you ever did. You're looking worn. I noticed half a dozen gray hairs this morning when I was standing beside your chair; and maybe—" he was trying to introduce a touch of humor—"it was a dozen. I didn't count. But, seriously, it isn't right. How can I help? You were always better at figures than I. We ought to live and—grow, in some way, it appears to me."

ELLEN SEAVER drew a long breath. Then she, too, looked across at the trees, and the hills, and the sky. "I used to think," she mused—a strange catch in her throat—"that all one had to do was just go on, until they found the pot of gold at the rainbow's edge. And the rainbow, as I looked at it, was Life; and there were all sorts of edges along the way. One came to the edge of this beauty—that achievement—every little while, and kept gathering gold from them all, until arms and heart and life were full. But life's been rather too full of work to get very far along toward any of the edges, hasn't it, let alone reaching them?"

John Seaver's eyes softened: "You should have done better than a poor minister," he observed wistfully. "You should have had a chance to unfold."

She let her eyes meet his: "Is anything better than life, side by side with the partner of one's heart?" she asked gently. "Besides, John, we've three children as fruitage."

"Yes," admitted John Seaver drily, "and I've always supposed they would be some sort of help when they got on. Instead, they seemed to be more of a care. Where it used to be little fold-erols and a picnic, at ten and fifteen, now it's luxuries, week-ends, and a steady consulting of their whims and pleasures instead of yours. God has been good to them. He gave them a wonderful mother—a passable father—and life. But, bless you, they don't realize it. Why can't Esther take a part of Hannah's work and Dorothy a part? Don, even, could have a share. It isn't right to you; and, Ellen, it isn't right to them."

Mrs. Seaver's worn face flushed; her eyes looked almost frightened. "No, no, John," she remonstrated. "It wouldn't do. They need their summer's rest and play. They'll not be young but once. Let them gather as much of the joy of life as they may."

Leaning forward, Seaver met her anxious eyes with steady, determined ones. "Ellen," he urged, "God's plan includes you, as much as your children. There are upper chambers in life for every soul to dwell in, and when they're there the joy of life beats for them full measure. But they don't get there by shirking; they don't get there by assuming the real duties of others, as you have been doing. I wish you would think about it, Ellen." With a twisted sort of smile he resumed his work.

"John's right," she acknowledged, returning to the kitchen. "But, dear me! he doesn't realize how impossible it is to begin"

WITH a snap the screen door opened and Dorothy stepped inside. "Motherie," she said coaxingly, "Elizabeth and I are planning a tramp to Fairmount Heights this afternoon. Can I bring her home to supper? And will you have hot muffins, and boiled corn, and strawberries? We'll be starved, you know. And, besides, Esther has invited Dora Wayne over. I just heard her. That'll make you do something rather extra nice, anyhow, won't it?"

"Why, yes. I suppose so," Mrs. Seaver's mind was running rapidly over supplies. She had planned rather closely, and had none too much on hand.

On her way to the door Dorothy stopped to fluff her shining locks before the mirror. "It'd be dandy if we could have ice-cream," she wheedled. "And sugar's not very scarce now. Couldn't you coax Dad to turn the freezer?" Without stopping for a reply, she was off.

A moment later Esther, cool, and wrapped about with the new mantle of her teacher's dignity, entered. "You're frightfully hot in here," she remarked rather aggressively. "Why don't you let Hannah do this?"

"It's wash-day." Her mother's voice was lifeless. "Hannah can't be in two places at once, my dear. Besides, Hannah is going Saturday night. I'll be out here all the time, then."

"Going!" Her eldest daughter's voice was indicative of dismay. "And you'll have to teach a green hand, in hot weather! I'm truly sorry, mother. What is the reason? Can't she be induced to stay, perhaps by a little extra pay through the summer?"

Said Mrs. Seaver, lifting a steaming kettle from the stove, "No, I'll not be teaching a green hand. To tell the truth, Esther, expenses have been going higher and higher until it seems hopeless attempting to make both ends meet without some sacrifice, so I told Hannah, this morning, she could go. Five dollars a week will be a real help."

Dismay deepened the brown of Esther's eyes to sudden black. "And I've invited Hope Darrow for three weeks," she announced ruefully. "She's going home from the mountains Saturday, so Dora Wayne told me, and I skipped right down and sent a letter. Whatever'll we do? She's used to everything. They've all kinds of money. I knew her in college."

"We'll get along somehow. We'll do the best we can." Her mother sighed unconsciously. "We can't have extras, though; and there's one comfort—being war time, she won't expect it."

ESTHER spoke quickly. "Of course not," she agreed. "I'd be ashamed to have or give extras while Uncle Sam needs them. But I do want things nice. And if Hannah's going, I don't see how they can be. Why not keep her, just until Hope has been and gone?"

"I'll manage." It struck Esther, all at once, that her mother seemed to be growing old very fast. "Don't fret, child. At least, we'll not get into debt."

Esther turned: "And by the way," she announced carelessly, "Dora Wayne is coming to tea."

"Very well."

As the door closed, Mrs. Seaver brought one hand wearily to her head. The weight of twenty extra years seemed suddenly to have descended upon her. "I'm thinking," she said grimly, "John's answer is close at hand."

Next moment, with startling suddenness, the words of yesterday's text seemed to stand out clearly before her: "For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways." And as she sensed them, something of quiet touched the nerves of the overburdened and sorely troubled woman. Pausing for a second, she was only half conscious of a quickly uttered "In thy way, O Lord, deliver us!" and at the dinner table, a few moments later, she spoke of the expected guest with an almost appealing glance at her husband: "Esther's invited company for the last of the week," she said casually. "It will be pleasant to have a new face among us for a bit."

The minister smiled, but said nothing; and when the telephone rang a few moments later he went into the hall to answer it. When he returned, he was smiling like a boy. "Who'd you say was coming Saturday?" he demanded.

"Hope Darrow. Why?" Esther's voice was defiant.

"Your informant appears to have got things twisted. John Darrow's her father, and they're at the hotel now. He and I used to be the greatest chums in the world. Do you suppose, Ellen, you could—" He stopped, and sat weakly down. "If I didn't go and invite them both for a visit," he declared blankly. "Oh, Ellen!"

"Never mind. We'll—" Hannah appeared. "If ye please, mum," she interrupted, "I'll be after lavin' the night. Ye said as I could go whenever I liked, an' I've a grand place fer startin' the morrow."

SUPPER was rather a gala affair. The table linen was spotless; the glass and china shone. Soft blush roses graced the table and sideboard, and the talk was animated and gay among the young people, while the minister and John Darrow lost themselves in reviewing college days. But a speeter crowded close to Mrs. Seaver's side, whispering incessantly betwixt the gay chatter, "Three weeks! three weeks!" until she was at times on the verge of crying aloud from pure nervousness.

She arose next morning with a dull headache, and heavy circles beneath her eyes. Her movements were lifeless, for she had spent the greater part of the night trying to plan some method of getting through the coming weeks, and as she dressed with nervous haste she did not note the clearness of the morning air or the song of the birds. Her mind was on the work of the day. But as she descended the stairs Hope Darrow pushed back the screen door and stepped inside. "I was out glorifying," she beckoned gleefully. "Come, for just a moment. Do!"

"I'm afraid I haven't time, my dear."

The girl's quick glance took in the circles beneath the heavy eyes—the drawn look about the tired mouth—and she spoke softly.

"You've a headache, I know," she said. "The air may do it good. Then we'll get breakfast together. It'll seem almost like having—mother again." Reaching for Mrs. Seaver's hand, she drew her into the fresh day. A moment they stood silently, then the girl drew a step closer.

"I love to come into the clean, new morning," she said impulsively, "and say 'Thank you, God, for the fresh day.'"

The elder woman laid a worn hand on her arm, her eyes suddenly dim. "Thank you, my dear," she said. "After all, one doesn't have to search too far or too long to find a rainbow's edge. I'd forgotten they were so close. I haven't heard the birds this summer before, or really seen God's morning sky."

Again there was silence. The girl, sensing a force she did not understand, watched the swiftly changing face of the minister's wife as the early morning wrapped its healing touch about her until at length, a soft, new peace in her eyes, she turned. "Thank you, my dear," she said again. "How little one knows just when, or where the message from God is needed. You brought me one just now."

"I was half afraid," faltered Hope Darrow, "yet I knew He—wanted me—to—speak."

AFTER breakfast the minister and his guests wandered into the yard; but when the rest of the family would have followed, Mrs. Seaver motioned them to wait. Sitting down, she glanced quietly from one to the other.

"We'll have to work hand in hand after this," she said. "Your part, Esther, will be looking after the sweeping, dusting and chamber work. I shall expect you, Dorothy, to set the table, do the dishes, answer the bell and telephone and assist about meals. Don will sweep the piazza, steps and walk each morning, and keep the yard neat, as well as the woodbox filled. I will do the cooking and planning, and fit in for all the other odds and ends. We'll all try and live in upper chambers after this. Now, I'm going to lie down for an hour. I've a headache."

Quietly the door closed behind her. How simple it had been, after all!

In the dining room, the three looked dubiously at each other. "We have been selfish," acknowledged Dorothy contritely.

"And I never so much as dreamed it," amended Esther.

"Bully for Ma!" said Don.

The minister glanced ruefully from the rose bush to the house, his wife's face flitting reproachfully before him. He had prayed long and earnestly for a solution of the problem. He could not understand how that invitation had slipped so unthinkingly from his tongue! But in her room the minister's wife closed her eyes with a blissful sense of peace. Surely, God had sent their guests!

"For as the heavens are high above the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways," she whispered, remembering her swiftly uttered prayer of yesterday; and a moment later—"Thank you, God," she murmured in her sleep.

AH, thou note of melody!
Exquisite bit of beauty
as a dream!

Thy golds and greens in harmony
Are bound together, till they seem

As though an angel in his joy did shed a tear,

And God transformed it into life,

Glossary of Prophetic Words

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

IN a former article we began a glossary of the great words of prophetic study, but did not advance very far. The words "age" and "apostasy" were so full of meaning as to fill up the space.

"Antichrist" and "Armageddon" are two other words of importance in the same alphabetic category, but they were treated sufficiently, the first in the article entitled "The Antichrist, His History and His Doom," and the second in the earlier series under the title, "When and Why Christ Will Come a Second Time."

"Beast" is a further word of prophetic importance, which also was defined and explained in the article on the "Antichrist."

"Coming," as applied to the Second Coming of Christ, is next in order. It is a translation of the Greek "parousia," which occurs twenty-four times in the New Testament, and is sometimes rendered "presence" as well as "coming." It means literally "the becoming present." It is the same word that Paul uses in I Cor. 16:17, where he speaks of the "coming" to him of Stephanas and others (see also II Cor. 7:6 and Phil. 1:26). Their "coming" was, of course, personal and visible, from which we gather that Christ's coming will be the same. There are other words used in the same connection which have the same significance, like "revelation," II Thess. 1:7, and "appearing," I Tim. 6:14 and other places. (See this worked out more fully in the article "What Is Meant by the Second Coming of Christ?"). Should the Christian Herald be unable to furnish back numbers of this article and that entitled "When and Why Christ Will Come a Second Time," they can be had in a small book by the author, called "Prophecy and the Lord's Return" (Revell, New York).

"DAY" is one of the prophetic words as used in the Biblical phrases "Day of the Lord" (Isa. 10:20; Zeph. 1:7); "Day of Vengeance" Isa. (61:2); "Day of Christ" (I Cor. 1:8); "Day of Salvation" (II Cor. 6:2). To speak of them in the order of time, the "day of salvation" is the whole of the present dispensation between the two advents of Christ. The "day of Christ" applies to the blessing and reward of the saints at his second coming (cf., in addition to the text above named, I Cor. 5:6; II Cor. 1:14; Phil. 1:6, 10; 2:16). "Day of the Lord" synchronizes with the whole of the millennial age, beginning just prior to it, continuing throughout, and extending somewhat beyond it. It is almost wholly connected with judgment on Israel and the Gentile nations. (See previous article on "Day of the Lord"—When It Comes and What It Means.") "Day of Vengeance" is practically the same as "Day of the Lord."

"Dispensation" was sufficiently considered in the former article under the word "age."

"GENTILES" is a translation of Hebrew and Greek words meaning "nations" and often rendered "heathen." It distinguishes all the nations of the earth from "Israel," which stands distinctively for God's chosen people in the line of Abraham. The "times of the Gentiles" began when God transferred the dominion of the earth from Israel to the Gentile nations, of which Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, was the earliest representative; in other words, about B. C. 600 (Jer. 27:1-11; Dan. 2:36-45; II Chron. 36:15-21). They will end with the present age and the commencement of the millennial age, when Israel will be in the ascendant as the earthly visualization of the Kingdom of God (see the article, "The 'Times of the Gentiles' and the Impending Judgments"). The "fulness of the Gentiles" (Rom. 11:25) is to be distinguished from the "times of the Gentiles" as meaning "the completion of the purpose of God in this age, namely, the outcalling from among the Gentiles of a people for Christ's name, the church which is his body (Acts 15:13-18)." (See the article in our former series, "The Place of the Church in the Plan of Redemption.")

"Gog and Magog" are words first found in Ezek. 38:2, and were interpreted and applied in our article on "What the Bible Teaches About Russia" (the Christian Herald, November 7, 1917). To this we add the following footnote from the Scofield Reference Bible: "That the primary reference is to the northern (European) powers, headed up by Russia, all agree. Gog is the prince, and Magog his land. The allusion to Meshech and Tubal (Moscow and Tobolsk) is a clear mark of identification. . . . The whole prophecy belongs to the yet future Day of the Lord and to the battle of Armageddon (Rev. 16:14; 19:17), but includes also the final revolt of the nations at the close of the millennial age (Rev. 20:7-9)." It should be added that the "Gog and Magog" in the last Scripture mentioned may not mean precisely the same nations as those indicated in Ezekiel, as a thousand years intervene between the two, but one would seem to be the prototype of the other.

"Kingdom." "Kingdom of God," "Kingdom of Heaven" were enlarged upon in the articles, "God's Covenant with David, or the Coming Kingdom," and "How the Kingdom and the Church Differ."

"REMNANT" means that which is left of anything, the piece remaining after the last cutting. It is frequently used in Scripture, especially in the Old Testament, but its chief prophetic interest centers in the history of Israel during the tribulation period. There may be a bad remnant as well as a good one. For the former see I Kings 14:10, R. V., Ezek. 23:25, and similar references; and for the latter Isa. 1:9, 11:16; Jer. 23:3; Zeph. 2:9; Rom. 9:27; Rev. 12:17. Throughout the whole history of Israel, wicked and disobedient as she was, there was always a faithful "remnant" who remained loyal to the true God. Recall in illustration the story of Elijah's day (I Kings 19:18); also Daniel and the three worthies of whom the sacred record speaks in Daniel 1 and 3, and "them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem" in Christ's time (Luke 2:38). Note particularly that there is such a remnant now, "a remnant according to the election of grace," i. e., in this church age, as indicated in Rom. 11:4, 5. But the "remnant" in the great day of trial that is to come will be composed of those Jews who will turn to the Lord and accept Jesus as their Messiah after the translation of the church. Zech. 13:9 refers to these, and they are brought before us again symbolically in Rev. 6:9-11; 7:4-8; 12:17; 20:4, and other places. These passages show that some of the "remnant" will undergo martyrdom in that period and be raised and reign with Christ and his church, while others will be spared through the tribulation and enter into the earthly blessings of the millennium. Their experiences during the tribulation are set before us prophetically in the millennial psalms, and furnish one of the most thrilling chapters of revealed history (see Ps. 9:9-14).

"RESTITUTION" is used but once in a prophetic sense, namely, in Acts 3:21, where Peter, speaking of the ascended Christ, says: "Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution (restoration R. V.) of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Some suppose this to refer to the salvation and restoration of the wicked dead and even of Satan himself, but their mistake is seen in the fact that Peter's words are limited by what the prophets have spoken. The context shows that he means what they have spoken concerning Israel, for he is addressing himself to Jews only. That which they have spoken relates to Israel's restoration to her land and the setting up of the kingdom of David (see Gen. 12:2, 3; Deut. 30:1-9; II Sam. 7:8-17; Rom. 11:26, etc.).

"TRIBULATION" is a word full of saddest meaning prophetically. Of course, ever since sin entered the world there has been tribulation with it, and it is even said of us Christians that "we must through much tribulation enter into the Kingdom of God" (Acts 14:22). But the tribulation of which the prophets speak is an event coincident with the end period of this age. By the "end period" is meant the last years of the age, or, in prophetic terms, the last week of Daniel's seventy weeks, especially the latter half of that week (Dan. 9:24-27). It is the time of Antichrist's supremacy, the time of the judgments described in Rev. 16, the time of Armageddon. But although all the nations of the earth must in some measure be involved in it, yet it is peculiarly "the time of Jacob's trouble" (Jer. 30:7). A mooted question among students of prophecy is whether the Church—i. e., the true church—will pass through the tribulation, some affirming that it will and others that it will not. The writer believes with the latter that the Church will be translated before that period, and he thinks a strong Biblical argument can be presented for it. Nevertheless, while the question is important, it is not so vital as to justify any division among brethren in regard to it.

"WEEKS" obtains its prominence as a prophetic word from its place in Daniel 9, referred to above. The prophet had asked God to reveal to him the time of the deliverance of his people Israel from their Babylonian captivity, and God had sent his angel to say, "seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon the holy city." "Weeks" is a translation of a Hebrew word meaning "sevens," and what God really said was, "seventy sevens are determined," without stating whether they were seventy sevens of days, weeks, months, or years. The context, however, shows that he meant years—seventy sevens of years, or 490 years. This period is divided again into three. There are first seven sevens, or forty-nine years, extending to the reestablishment of Jerusalem after the Babylonian captivity; sixty-two sevens, or 434 years, down to the crucifixion of Christ and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; and one seven, or the last seven years of this age. The intervening time from the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews among the nations until their return again to their land at the end period is not included in the 490. This is in accordance with a principle in God's dealing with that people not to count time in their history while they are sojourning in captivity to the Gentiles.

"ZION." This word is named in this list chiefly to say that it is never applied in Scripture to the Church. Much confusion of thought and misinterpretation of the prophetic Scriptures have been caused by the failure to recognize this fact. For one thing, it has caused all the Old Testament promises to be applied to the Church and all the curses to Israel. It accounts, too, for the mischievous principle of spiritualizing Scriptures that ought to be taken literally, and which makes the Bible to many a book so "hard to be understood." "Zion" is the translation of the Hebrew word for "castle." In Deut. 4:48, it is given to the peak of Mount Hermon. Later, it is applied to the eminence in Jerusalem where David established his throne. Sometimes the whole city of Jerusalem is called Zion, and once the word is used symbolically of heaven (Heb. 12:22), but it is never applied to the Church.

Among the Workers

EVANGELIST J. HENRY GRAMPS is laboring in New York City, giving testimony to the victorious Christian life, and urging all believers who have not yet attained thereto to allow the Holy Spirit to perfect them and thus bring them up to the stature of Christ.

THAT genuine pleasure is experienced in doing work at the Bowery Mission was again illustrated when on a recent evening a few talented friends visited the Mission and gave an excellent concert. Arline J. Thomas (soprano), Helen Flaek Bristol (elocutionist) and Mary M. Ackerman (pianist) filled out a pleasant evening. It is wonderful to see how the homeless, jobless and, in many cases, hungry men appreciate good music. The concert was given under the direction of Miss Martha Johnston. The program over, the men formed in line for the bread and coffee which is supplied by the Mission after such gatherings.

AN appeal comes from Korea for pictures which have been used in our American Sunday schools. "Our people are poor and there is little that they can afford to buy. Every bit you have sent has been used and some of it several times over. Now in addition to the 120 Sunday schools we want anything in the shape of a picture, preferably large wall charts for schools. We hope to have 40 new schools running before summer." This appeal is especially to Presbyterians and Methodists. For further information and an introduction to a missionary, write, indicating your denomination, to the World's Sunday School Association, Surplus Material Department, 216 Metropolitan Tower, New York City. There is a call for similar pictures from every foreign mission field.

OWING to the success of the first volunteer workers' training course, the Workers' Bureau of the National Board, Young Women's Christian Association, is offering further similar instruction. Many will be able to come to New York for the few weeks' instruction which will enable them to work more efficiently in their home towns.

The courses will commence July 9, September 17, November 5, and in 1919, February 4. They last about three and a half weeks. The fee is $10. This instruction is planned to train committee women, organizers and administrators, investigators, leaders in girls' clubs and patriotic leagues, teachers of leaders, speakers and would-be speakers, clerical workers and helpers and women who can do odd jobs, whether they intend to work in the Young Women's Christian Association or some other organization. The headquarters of the Bureau are at 600 Lexington Avenue, New York City.

FROM the North Presbyterian Church, New York, Rev. John R. Mackay, pastor, have gone out 172 young men to serve the nation as soldiers and sailors. The members subscribed for the Third Liberty Loan $335,000.

Conserves—A Branch of Conservation of Foods

I BELIEVE readers will be interested in an extract from a circular sent out by the British Food Controller, an organization akin in purpose and conduct to our Food Administration.

This extra supply of sugar will be distributed with democratic fairness, inspired by that spirit of sharing which has come to England out of common danger and suffering. Those who receive extra sugar for jam-making must guarantee not to use it for any other purpose. They will be credited with one and three-quarters pounds of jam for every pound of sugar supplied, and will be expected to reduce their purchases of jam to that extent so as to leave for city dwellers the commercial jams and marmalade.

Our American Food Administration speaks in like tone and temper:

The Food Administration has adopted a certificate system to meet the household needs during the coming fruit season.

The consumer is asked to estimate his needs and fill out a certificate which will be furnished him by his grocer. The dealer is required to forward this certificate to the Federal Food Administrator within one week after it is turned in to him.

The Food Administration asks the assistance of every householder in bringing about a practical distribution. The success of the plan depends on the good sense and good will of the American citizen. Cooperation, prompt action and a democratic sense of fair play will prevent a sugar shortage in America during the fruit season.

The season for small fruits is here. Not one berry should go to waste, and the eanny housewife forecasts the time when they will be needed more sorely than now. The desserts and "sweets" that are to make next winter's daily food palatable and healthful depend largely upon her stoeking, within the next few weeks, her preserve and pickle pantry shelves. The rules governing the distribution of sugar prescribe five pounds for each single purchase for family consumption. Twenty-five pounds are allowed to the buyer who affirms that the sugar is to be used in canning or preserving, pickling, or "conservation" in any form.

JAMS and marmalades are in high favor in England. "Preserves," after the American style, are comparatively rare overseas. The recipes we offer in the Corner will be for the English conserve. Others for canning fruits now in season will follow shortly. Marmalade and jam have the signal advantage of requiring less sugar than "pound for pound" sweetmeats. Canning calls for even less. The season of small fruits is so short in this country that we have not a day to lose.

First of all, provide as much sugar as you are likely to use and see that not a grain goes for any other purpose. I hope last year's jars and glasses are intact and ready for use. Extra tops and new rubbers may be bought to take the place of any that are broken or missing. Have all these preliminaries attended to before the fruit is picked or bought. Also see that tissue and waxed papers are within call, and plenty of the paraffin which is to make assured conservation "doubly sure."

Strawberry Jam

Pick over and wash the berries and let them drain in a colander. Set over the fire in a granite or porcelain-lined kettle, and bring to the boil. Return to the colander and press all through the holes. Measure the mass thus obtained and allow a generous half-pound of sugar to each pint. Turn the crushed berries and juice back into the kettle and boil very fast for five minutes before stirring in the sugar, which should, meanwhile, have been heating in the open oven. Cook steadily for thirty minutes, stirring often to prevent scorching, and pour into tumblers or jars set in a pan of hot water to avoid the risk of cracking. When the jam is cold and firm, cover with melted paraffin and fit on the tops.

Strawberry Marmalade

Choose the ripest berries for this. Pick over, and wash. Drain off the wet and weigh the berries. Allow to each pound three-quarters of a pound of sugar. Put the sugar into cans ready for heating in the oven. Turn the berries into your porcelain-lined or granite kettle and bring quickly to a boil. As they heat, crush with a wooden potato-pounder or a silver soup ladle. When they are free from lumps, stir in gradually the hot sugar. Cook ten minutes, skim out the fruit with a perforated spoon, and put it into a piteher set in boiling water and covered. Boil the juice left in the kettle for ten minutes longer, or until it begins to look like jelly. Put the fruit back, bring all once more to the boil, and fill to the brim small jars set in hot water to prevent cracking. Cover with tissue paper and fit on air-tight tops.

Red or black raspberry jam and marmalade may be made according to either of the foregoing recipes.

Red Raspberry and Currant Marmalade

Mix together two parts of red raspberries and one of red currants. Pick over and wash. Drain off the water and measure the fruit. Weigh and spread in flat pans three-quarters of a pound of sugar to each pound of the berries, and set the pans in the open oven, stirring once in a while to avoid scorching. Meanwhile, put the berries over the fire in a granite or porcelain-lined kettle and bring to a quick boil, stirring often to break the currant-skins. When all are broken and the juice flows freely, turn the contents of the kettle into a colander and drain off and save the liquid that will come away without pressing or shaking. Return the fruit to the kettle, add the heated sugar, and cook over a moderate fire for twenty minutes, stirring faithfully from the bottom and often. The sugar will make all the syrup needed for the conserve. Have ready small jars set in a pan of hot water with tops ready heated, and fill to the brim to allow for shrinking. Lay waxed or tissue papers upon the surface and seal at once.

Currant and Red Raspberry Jelly

This is a pleasant adjunct to the jam. Strain through a cheese-cloth bag the reserved juice drained from the hot berries, measure it and weigh the sugar to go with it, allowing a pound to a pint of the liquid. Set the sugar in the oven to heat while you bring the juice to a rapid boil. Keep this up for fifteen minutes after the boil begins; stir in the sugar and cook just one minute. Pour into jelly glasses, and when it is cold and firm, cover with melted paraffin and screw on the tops.

You have now a few glasses of delicious jelly—so delicious as to justify the extra supply of sugar required to make it.

Rhubarb Marmalade

We make too little use of this product of the garden. It is ready for the table in the spring when nature demands correctives for biliary disorders induced by the comparatively sedentary habits of the winter. Rhubarb has gentle sanitary and medicinal properties combined with a pleasing acid highly acceptable to palates weary of potted meats, canned vegetables, salt beef and pork.

Rhubarb Marmalade

Cut off the tops of the stalks, and scrape off carefully the thin skin. Do not cut it so deeply as to make it "bleed." This done, lay in very cold water for an hour. Then with a sharp knife clip the stalks into inch-lengths, dropping into cold water as you cut them. Weigh the rhubarb without wiping it, and put into the preserving-kettle while dripping wet. Allow half a pound of sugar to each pound of fruit. Set the kettle over the fire, with no water except that which drips from the fruit, and bring to a gentle boil. When the rhubarb is soft add the sugar, which you have kept hot in the open oven, and cook slowly for half-an-hour. It is quite ready for use now, but if sealed up while hot in glass jars, allowed to get cold, then wrapped in thick paper to exclude the light, and kept in a cool place, it will keep until next winter.

Rhubarb and Raisin Marmalade

Make as directed in last recipe, but when the sugar is added for the final half-hour boil, put into the kettle, for every two pounds of fruit, a handful of sultana (or seedless) raisins which have been picked over and washed. They impart a delightful flavor to the rhubarb.

Changes in Relief Work

heard, at popular prices. All this was a grandstand play for the benefit of the Transcaucasian Republic. The majority believed it.

The day we left Tiflis a Swedish and Norwegian Red Cross unit, with a German consul in tow, arrived there.

We had heard that the Elizabetpol station was burned to the ground, but it stood up bravely in its own defense when we passed through. We had heard harrowing tales of Armenians being dragged shrieking from the trains by the Tartars, but we saw nothing of this, though Tartar guards came through the train. That this inspection was not entirely a bluff was evidenced the following day when five members of the British military mission in Tiflis were arrested and removed from the train.

IN the dry plain we saw several villages in flames. Whether they were Armenian villages burned by the Tartars, Tartar villages burned by the Armenians, or Tartar villages burned by the Bolsheviks, I cannot say.

Baku has its own subsidiary currency, valued at a little below the par of Kerensky money. Its shops were much fuller, and there was much more food than during my three previous visits. But prices were higher. Of course, there is no metal currency in circulation, and since the one thousand rouble notes which the government are so fond of printing cannot be used in buying the necessities of life, each city or district has had to issue its own money. A thousand-rouble note brings 970 roubles in Russian currency, 1,000 in Tiflis notes, 1,150 in Baku paper, and as high as 1,400 in some places; but this local currency is worth nothing elsewhere.

Our route through Persia was closed through the anti-Ally sympathies of the people. The railway to Rostov was running only third-class cars, which are not fit for American relief workers. The Central Asia Railway was closed, due to the declaration by the Emir of Bokhara that, since no one could effectively deny the fact, his domain was a free and independent state. The Volga route was closed because of the ice and the tie-up of the fleet. From Tiflis to Baku was a case of skillet to stove, and a battle was expected any day.

The fight between the Tartars and Bolsheviks was announced for Sunday afternoon, March 31.

The fighting lasted till Monday night. Sunday morning two shiploads of Russian soldiers from Persia arrived, and they joined in the assault on the Tartars. The fight was started by the Tartars but from the first they were confined to their own quarters and never had a chance. Two gunboats bombarded the Tartar district with considerable precision and damage, and machine guns commanded every important crossing. The walls of the fifteenth century Tartar city remain, and from the loopholes designed for blunderbuses the modern Tartars tried to fire with modern guns. But the Bolshevik machine guns wove their shower of lead back and forth across the loop-holes like a shuttle.

Wells and I were down in the city while the gunboats bombarded the romantic Tartar tower, six centuries old. In the city, as we saw it Tuesday morning, the streets were still strewn with corpses. From the veranda of the English Club we had seen and heard the machinery of war. Here we saw the results. Not one man in ten was a combatant. The Tartar hospital and theatre—one of the most beautiful buildings in Baku—was completely gutted. The Tartar bazaar was burning and the streets cluttered with fresh and dried fruits, canned goods, dried fish and dead bodies. There was no real looting, but every one helped himself to what he wanted. Soldiers hacked open conserve tins and one officer opened a can of luscious pineapple with his Cossack sword, while the juice ran down upon the face of a wax-like figure at his feet, all shriveled up and twisted into a ball.

We went on to the house where the Comptons had lived through it all and learned from them how they had seen four wealthy Tartars stolen from their guard and killed before their eyes, and also how, when they were looking down into the street from the stairway, a crowd of Tartars came rushing up to this Armenian house for safety. The Armenians fought against the Tartars, but both Tartars and Armenians hid their friends who were endangered.

THE Whites and Dr. Reynolds had lived in the heart of the Tartar quarter and had been forced to leave in the midst of the fight. All their baggage was lost, including a number of souvenirs which Dr. Reynolds had tried to bring away from Armenia. Yet the dear old man only said, "Well, that settles my baggage difficulties."

The Bolshevik victory in Baku is liable to be short-lived. Germany is slowly but surely driving toward Tikhoretzskaya, the junction between the Rostov line and Tsaritsuin. Once there, she cuts off the only railway connection with the north. To close the Volga, stir up the Bokharans, Tartars and Turkomans in Turkestan, to bring Persia into the fight and to have the Turks close in from Batum, is all part of a German plan made many years before England sent her army to France.

In the Grozni oil fields, the workmen are holding their American and English managers as hostages, while oil is running to waste at the rate of five million gallons a day. With such wealth in their hands, the workmen have no way of turning it into wages, and they believe that if they hold on to their managers long enough some one will ransom them.

We left Baku April 9 and reached Astrakhan three days later. One of the finest Volga boats was turned over to our party, with the privilege of living on it till the river opened to Samara. I felt it was my duty to see something more of Russia, so with Welch and Catchpool—who were going on to Samara before joining the party there later—I left my friends and set out on the long trip home. Welch and Catchpool left me the next day, and I rode third class, in the Czechoslovak military trains, on a Russian Red Cross train, with wounded from Kharkov, with the Red Army, and on one passenger train after another, as anxious to get out of Russia as I was, a year ago, to get in.

Beginning the Christian Life

International Sunday School Lesson for July 7
Acts 16:13-34

Two Types of Conversion

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph. D.

WE enter today upon a new course of International Lessons, called "Studies in the Christian Life." They are different from the lessons of the past in that they are selected from various parts of the Bible according to the topics, instead of following one book or one man's life. In this way one of the disadvantages of the International Lessons has been overcome. It is very helpful to turn frequently to topical study, searching through the Scriptures for light on the subject in hand, instead of taking up one bit or section of Scripture alone, as people more often do.

At the outset, let us determine to use our Bibles in class and to have a real study and search, using the numerous references provided and finding others for themselves. Let us try to answer, week by week, the problems that are certainly coming up in the lives of the young in connection with just such themes as we have this quarter. Be practical; these are all very practical lessons: Reading the Bible, Praying, Obedience, Working in the Church, Speaking for Christ, etc. Look over the topics in advance. This is the summer quarter, and it is too bad that many scholars will miss some of these essential teachings. If your school closes, pick out the themes you think most pressing, or try to have your class take the quarterlies for home Sabbath reading.

The Experience of Lydia and Her Household

Our reading describes Paul's first convert in Philippi, his first in Europe for that matter. He had sought for some means of making a beginning, and as was then his custom he went to the Jews. There was no synagogue, but there was a place of prayer by the river side. Only a group of women had come, but Paul was not discouraged. Among them was a woman of character and ability, probably a Gentile convert to Judaism. Prepared by thoughtful worship and a knowledge of the Hebrew Scriptures, she at once accepted Christ. Then she brought the other members of her household with her, and they also, having been rightly instructed, entered as readily and peacefully into the Christian life.

Lydia is a good representative of a great company of people who find Jesus in their search for the best and follow him quickly. Her seeking spirit had found in Judaism something that heathenism could not give, and she was now ready for the truth as it is in Christ. Philip's convert, the Ethiopian treasurer, was of the same type.

The Experience of the Philippian Jailer

How different was this from that of Lydia! Here was a catastrophic conversion indeed! Even a physical upheaval of the earth was concerned in bringing this man to Christ! He had probably heard, in a vague way, of the teaching. Now he saw its power in the singing prisoners. Suddenly the earthquake came, and, in his terror of losing the captives, he looked death in the face. When the calm reassurance of Paul reached him he was all atremble and his heart was deeply touched. He wanted faith and self-control like theirs. He wanted release from fear. How could he get it? "Believe on the Lord Jesus," came the answer.

Paul's own experience had been so similar that he must have been very sympathetic. He had been a persecutor of Christians. Yet, in some way, his heart was stirred and his mind perplexed by their simple faith and loyalty. Then came the great experience on the Damascus road.

Are Our Boys and Girls Making a Beginning?

For the past two quarters we have taught our classes the life of Christ, but have we once given them the chance to make a definite beginning in following him? Of course, we believe and trust that they are unconsciously embarking upon the Christian way, growing up in him whom they have learned to love. But we ought to be sure to give them a chance to make a stand that will register decision and strengthen the will. We must be careful how we conduct ourselves on "decision days," lest we give wrong ideas to some or drive others farther away. We must keep in mind the undoubted fact that most of our youth from Christian homes come to the most normal and natural and quiet of consecrations. They have had a better start than even Lydia or the Ethiopian. The writer can not remember a time when he did not know and trust Jesus Christ. Innumerable others have proved Horace Bushnell's maxim that "a child should grow up a Christian and never know himself otherwise." But such are deeply thankful for growing light and deepened faith as Christian experience developed.

We deal with many a young Timothy, who has inherited faith from his grandmother and mother, and from his grandfather and father, too. Such need only the tactful friendship of some God-sent Paul to be enlisted for life in the great campaign of the Gospel.

Occasionally, even in the most sedate of churches, we deal with quite a different problem. A child comes from a Christless home, or an unfavorable environment, with prejudices or habits antagonistic to the Way of Christ. Such may have very sudden breaks in their attitude toward the Kingdom. We must be ready to help at the critical time. Still others are temperamentally peculiar, and will oscillate between faith and scoffing. Such was one young man who not long ago burst into my study, and without any preliminary remark, exclaimed: "If I don't join the church now, I never will!"

Our lesson shows us plainly that we must not try to cram all souls into one mold. How different were Peter and John, Paul and Luke, Lydia and the jailer! By what diverse ways they achieved sainthood! Remember that one of our scholars may become a quiet home-keeper, while another will be sent to scenes of danger and violence on some foreign shore. Yet the same Christ is able to energize their diversities of gifts by one and the same spirit.

And then, too, beginning is only beginning, though it is critical enough. We must not mislead young people into expecting perfection at once. We must not anticipate feelings and experiences that may not come for years, if at all, to the type of mind concerned. Particularly after a season of revival, we must have true Christian nurture and friendly "following up," of the younger converts especially, lest they fall quickly away. It is a scandal and a sin for a church to bring a soul to Christ for the new birth, and then leave the newly-born to struggle and fend for himself.

Who Are Disciples?

Who shall venture to draw the line between disciples and strangers to Christ? Surely not we. Yet there are certain principles quite clearly involved. Disciples understand at least in part the holy will of Christ and seek to obey it. They find time to think about him and to inquire wherein his purposes call for their cooperation. They are self-denying, for "whosoever doth not bear his own cross and come after me, cannot be my disciple." They love the Gospel, for "if ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed." They are abundant in good works, for "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples." I suppose that the supreme test is in our treatment of one another; every one can tell a Christian spirit by Christian conduct among the brotherhood. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."

Lydia, acting as the eager hostess of the apostolic band: the jailer, in unconscious imitation of Christ, getting out the basin of water to bathe his prisoners: the treasurer to Candace, going on his way rejoicing; these are obviously disciples of Christ. Close the lesson by pointing out the desirability of every loyal friend of Jesus enrolling with his Church and working in cooperation with others for his Kingdom.

When Christians Fight Are They Christians?

duty. In the very words with which Israel was urged to carry out her determination to place David upon the throne, I urge you now to enthrone King David's greater Son. You have long talked of making Jesus King—"Now therefore do it."

Had the Hebrew nation sincerely rendered unto God the things that are his, they would not have been under the painful and embarrassing necessity of rendering tribute unto Caesar. From which it would seem that "hypocrite" was not too severe a word for Jesus to use in this instance. For the Herodians espoused the cause of the invading Romans for selfish political reasons, and the Pharisees insisted upon the old Jewish order for equally selfish religious reasons; so both were indeed hypocritical in the question they brought to Jesus. Selfishness has always made strange bedfellows.

WHEN General Washington moved his troops to West Point in 1780, the Hessians followed, expecting to stamp out the flame of freedom in the breast of the Continentals. As they approached Springfield, they were met by a company of farmers armed with flintlocks. The colonists fought desperately in defense of their firesides, families and liberty, until the wadding for the muskets gave out. Then they began to waver. At this important moment, Rev. James Caldwell, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, mounted a horse and galloped away, shouting "Hold them a minute longer, boys, until I get back." He entered his church, gathered up an armful of hymnals from the pews and hurried back to the bridge where the battle raged. Tearing the leaves from the books he cried, "There's your wadding; give them Watts, boys! Give them Watts!"

Was he Christian? Go to Springfield, N. J., some day, and you will find the answer. There, standing in front of the Presbyterian Church, is a magnificent monument erected by the sovereign state of New Jersey, an expression of gratitude and approval as it is the verdict of an enlightened Christian conscience.

Inscribed upon the face of this monument are the words,

"Of what avail the plow or soil,
Or land or life, if freedom fail?"

This is history's most pregnant hour. It is the hour of the world's new birth. Spiritual forces, long germinating in the heart of mankind, are soon to emerge offspring of heaven—in all the promised power and glory of a twentieth century Christ-man. Again Herod seeks the young child's life to destroy it. His sword is out. But this time the tyrant shall not triumph. Materialistic civilization must be struck down before a new civilization of spiritual reality. Is there any question upon which side the Christian should take his stand?

Such is my idea of Christianity in a national crisis. I regard "the Son of God goes forth to war, a kingly crown to gain," as one of the grandest hymns of the Christian Church, a faithful expression of the spirit and teachings of Jesus. Under the standard thus set up, I take my stand and I ask every toiler, soldier, sailor and aviator now fighting for freedom, every mother and wife who has torn from her breast a priceless jewel of love that she may give it to her country to set in Democracy's crown of rejoicing, to stand with me, that like a mighty army may move the Church of God.

When Christians fight are they Christians? Yes, when the cause is just.

Guard Against Razor Rust

When "Our Boys" leave for the front, thousands of kits will contain 3-in-One.

Training-camps are full of 3-in-One. Also traveling men's grips. Homes, too. Wherever there's need for quick, easy, comfortable self-shaving, there's need for

3-in-One

The High Quality Razor Oil

3-in-One prevents razor rust. Yes rust!

No razor blade can be wiped absolutely dry. Moisture and lather remain on the cutting edge—between the tiny saw-like teeth which a microscope reveals.

This moisture—that you can't wipe off—causes rust to form. Invisible to the eye, but painfully evident to your face when the razor "pulls" and hurts.

That's why self-shavers need 3-in-One Oil.

Before and after shaving, do this: Moisten thumb and forefinger with a drop or two of 3-in-One. Draw the razor blade gently between them. The 3-in-One penetrates into the pores of the steel and prevents rust forming. Makes the edge last longer. Doubles the life of any safety blade. Old-style razors require fewer honings if 3-in-One is regularly applied.

Razor straps are kept soft and pliable and made to take hold of the razor better by rubbing in a few drops of 3-in-One.

3-in-One is sold at all good stores in 50c, 25c and 15c bottles; also 25c Handy Oil Cans. Look for the big red ONE on the label.

"X" Liquid repairs 24,000 radiator leaks in 10 minutes!

IF every one of the corners in your automobile radiator leaked at one time—you could repair all the leaks permanently in 10 minutes—with "X" Liquid. You don't have to lay up the car—or worry about the cost of repairing!

One can of "X" Liquid poured into the water makes the radiator as good as new. If there are any leaks in the pump, gaskets, connections, etc., those, too, are repaired. Leave "X" Liquid in the water and you'll never again be bothered with leaks!

Thousands of car owners say that "X" is the most marvelous product that ever came to help them out of a difficulty.

No More Rust or Scale!

EVERY thoughtful owner knows that Rust and Scale are constantly damaging the cooling system! So he keeps "X" Liquid in the water to loosen the Rust and Scale now present. And "X" positively prevents new Rust or Scale from forming.

In this way the water passages are kept clean, cooling is improved, oil saved—and the motor performs better.

Don't confuse "X" with cements, or flaxseed meals in liquid or solid form. These simply choke the leak—for a while. But "X" Liquid makes a scientific, permanent repair.

"X" Liquid is the only product that makes the entire cooling system LEAKPROOF—RUSTPROOF—SCALEPROOF.

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

UNDER the leadership of an organization known as "The Mothers of Defenders of Democracy," a plan is being worked out for the organization of a great Prayer League among all Christians, to "envelop the whole nation in continuous prayer, making President Wilson's proclamation for May 30 the basis of continuous appeal for national guidance, protection for our sons, and the victory of international justice and righteousness." The plan involves the pledge of prayers by different people in different parts of the country, so scheduled that in every minute of the day and night groups of believers will be following each other in one-minute silent prayers. On June 8 the time from 12 noon to 2 P. M., New York time, had been completely covered. The plan has the approval of all Christian churches. The plan is ambitious and not unworthy of this Christian people. Through every time of stress America has always prayed her way. In the darkest hours of the sixties, faith may have wavered; but even when doubt assailed, prayer never ceased. And so today, when the country faces greater danger than at any time in its history, President Wilson has asked the nation to pray with him, for he, like Lincoln, Washington, McKinley and Garfield, is a praying man.

P. A. Lotterhos, a First Bible Study prize-winner, was impelled to write to Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Reiton, missionaries in Hongkong. In due course he received an answer, and he sent their interesting letter to the Prayer League, asking us to pray for the good work that these consecrated teachers are doing in China. The League will remember them, and also the earnest Bible student at home, who had the kind thought to send a letter of cheer to these faithful workers in the foreign field.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

The Blessing of Sacrifice

IN an address delivered at Liberty Hut in Philadelphia, on his return from France recently, Secretary of War Newton D. Baker gave a presentation of the spiritual issues of the great struggle. He said:

"I don't know whether it is true that there is any such thing as cosmic psychology, or that the composite thing that may be called the cosmic thought of the world ever gets itself focused and made audible for all to hear, but I do firmly believe that if we all in the United States intend that the right shall prevail, and will it with our whole being, there would be a tremendous stimulation and strengthening of the part of our effort which is represented by our army in France.

"I heard of an incident which seemed to me very beautiful. In order to expedite and hasten the application of America's military power as an addition to that already there, we are brigading our troops with French and British divisions in order that they may rapidly acquire the actual experience of the front line. A group of our soldiers were in the front line trench for their first training in actual warfare, and a Regular Army officer whose name I dare not mention, but known, perhaps, to many people here, spent the whole night walking along in that front line trench in the dark, touching men on the shoulder, asking them how they got along, giving them a word of cheer and encouragement. It was their first baptism of actual fire, and they were raided that night and acquitted themselves brilliantly. The next day, when some of their officers were sitting around the mess exchanging experiences and telling frankly how they had felt when, in the loneliness of the advance outpost and in the darkness of a moonless night, they heard the adversary attack, one man spoke up and said: 'Early in the night this officer (naming him) came through the trenches and put his hand on my shoulder and said, "Captain, how is everything here?" and I told him, "Well." And he patted me on the shoulder a couple of times and said, "Good! Hold them!" And, he said, "the officer disappeared up the trench, but all night long when the fight grew fast and furious, and when strange and hitherto unexperienced sensations were crowding thick around, and I was disposed to feel lonely and unfamiliar and to doubt whether I was equal to that responsibility, all night long I could feel that hand on my shoulder, and a voice saying, "Hold them!"

"We must put our hands on the shoulders of those boys in the trenches. They hear what goes on in America; they hear what we are talking about; they learn whether our hearts are as stout as theirs; they learn to know whether we see the big things which they see, and when opportunities come for America to express her spirit, and she does express it, as she always has in this war, in certain and clear and vigorous and firm and decided terms and tones, they hear it, and it is a hand on their shoulder on the dark and moonless nights, and it is the voice of their friends and their country saying to them, 'Hold them!'"

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department of the Exchange of Experiences Between Neighbors and All People Who Live in Proximity

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

LAST week we were just ready to start a girls' canning and cooking class in every neighborhood. The plan was so simple and unpretentious that any group of girls could have one.

All canning adventures are not as simple. Here, for instance, is one that included a whole community. I cannot tell you how deeply it impressed me! It is one of the finest examples of neighborhood co-operation I have ever come across:

Community Canning

Last summer the "Junior Order" gave to a Farm-Life School in North Carolina a canner for the use of the school and community. This was placed under a shelter on the school grounds within easy reach of all, and was under the supervision of the matron.

It was then announced that all women in the community who wished to do so could bring their fruit and vegetables to the canner on certain days and all work together. No one was allowed simply to can her own stuff.

All products and profits were combined and shared equally every woman working two hours for each five cans she took home with her. Each fifteenth can was left with the matron for rent. She paid the school, and the school then paid her for her work of supervision.

The canner was an immense success. Several thousand cans being put up by the community in addition to what was raised on the school farm. Isn't this well worth the attention of other communities? Miss E. C. JONES.

THAT account speaks for itself. Friends; so I shall hurry on to our next one: an adventure in neighboring well suited to these war days. For if there is anything more patriotic than the carrying on of such work as this among boys and girls in the country, I do not know what it is. Every girl who has a hand in it is serving her country as faithfully as her brothers at the front:

State Fair Canning Contest

Last year our high school agriculture teacher was hired for three months during the summer to look after the girls' and boys' club work. He organized corn, garden, pig, baby, beef, and canning clubs.

At the regular Chautauqua session and farm camp for the boys and girls, he selected four of the older girls to enter the State Fair Canning Contest. These girls had seemed to grasp the "cold-pack" canning method easily, but you may be sure they practiced it many times before the demonstrations were given at the State Fair at Des Moines, Iowa.

They also made themselves State Canning Club uniforms consisting of blue dresses with white collars, cuffs, belts and pockets. By adding a red tie, they combined the national colors, thus showing their patriotism.

They had been very enthusiastic from the first, and as a consequence did splendidly on the day of the demonstrations. There were twenty-two teams competing, and our home girls won third place. Don't you think that was pretty good?

Since then our girls have often given canning demonstrations; and they are now preparing to train the younger girls in canning to be ready for next season. MARTHA EMMINGS.

AND here, neighbors, next on our "canning-day" program, is an adventure for us grown-ups. Doesn't it suggest to you the possibilities of combining the hard work of canning with the sheer joy of a neighborly good time?

An Orange Marmalade Contest

The funds of our club had become very low, and in view of the fact that with our funds we helped the sick and needy this troubled me quite a little. I wondered how we could raise money for the many demands coming in to us.

The "orange" season was about at its height, and I thought if we could have a kind of "orange marmalade contest" we might make out.

I suggested the idea to the members of our little club, and we held a meeting at a member's house. We decided that on a certain Saturday afternoon we would have a "sale" in a hall which another neighbor had offered for the occasion—that we would bring to this hall the results of our labors—marmalade—all put up in cans or jars, to be sold at the sale. Each one who brought marmalade for sale was also to bring a sample in a very small jar as a "taster."

The afternoon of the festival arrived and all the neighbors came, bringing with them many jars of marmalade over which they had spent precious hours. Each also brought a "taster" with her.

Judges for the occasion were chosen by "draft"—every one present writing her name on a slip of paper and putting it in a hat; some one then being selected and drawing out five names. These five were the judges. They were required to taste each sample and decide among themselves what one was worthy of the prize: a box of oranges.

Well, we sold all the jars of marmalade and made money for the much-needed cause. Besides, we had a mighty good time. The prize was awarded to a very dear Scotch neighbor of mine whose marmalade was simply delicious. I shall be only too glad to send her recipe to any neighbor who cares to write to me for it. It is a good one—worth keeping until the orange season is again at its height. A FRIEND.

Do send for that recipe, comrades. And meantime, try out this "contest" idea, even though you may have to substitute peaches or cherries for the oranges, which at present are a bit costly.

THIS brings us finally to our last adventure for the day: the story of an heroic country pastor's wife and the unique and delightful way in which she taught some eager children how to cook and can.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: One day when I was taking a Johnny cake out of the oven, two sisters (half orphans) happened to drop in, and expressed the wish that they knew how to make something that smelt and tasted as good as that. I told them to come again, the following Friday afternoon, after school, to bring the rest of the "bunch" and be prepared to stay for supper, which we would have early enough for them to reach home (three miles away) before dark. They came not only that Friday afternoon, but every other, until they had grasped the fundamentals of cooking and preserving.

There were two requirements: each one had to bring a list of special dishes their fathers and brothers wanted them to learn to cook; and the girls were to try out, at home, during the week, the dishes we had prepared at the lesson.

There were no dues, but each one brought anything she happened to have in the way of supplies: sometimes a bag of potatoes; or a pail of buttermilk; or eggs—it didn't matter, as the parsonage cupboard was always accommodating. We planned, each time, to have a well-balanced meal which we might enjoy together. This we timed, as one would have to at home. We also worked at pickling, canning and jelly-making in season. Each lesson included some kind of bread or biscuit.

After our parsonage playground was opened, we had a cookie lesson and had to make a double batch, so that all the children might have sample cookies. Oh, it was lots of fun. Once in the fall when a demonstrator from Amherst spent a week in town with his auto truck, we had him come out on Friday afternoon and give the boys a lesson in stock-judging, and both boys and girls a lesson in the selection of seed corn. Then we wound up with a good old-fashioned "taffy-pull," the treat of the cooking-class.

I do not see that we did anything other communities could not do. We just began, kept going, and had a good time every minute. A COUNTRY PASTOR'S WIFE.

WE have come to the end of one of our finest meetings of the year. Christian Herald Neighbors; and before I wish you good-by for another busy week, I wish to urge you to interest the young girls of your neighborhood in what we have discussed today: the canning, pickling, and preserving of every surplus vegetable and fruit. These girls, with their uniforms and contests and prizes will enthrall their elders; and the result will be a food-conservation record for your town or village that you will be as proud to wear as if it were a war-medal conferred personally upon you. Indeed, such a record is the only kind of war-medal we petticoat soldiers who are "keeping the home fires burning" can hope to win; but after all, could there be a nobler—a more satisfying distinction? I think not. Just let us be sure that the women and girls of our town are found worthy of it.

Why our newest idea—the Roll-A-Bed-Tent—couldn't be pictured here

FOR several months we have been perfecting a real joy for the motorist and camper—the Wilson Roll-A-Bed Tent. It had to be exactly right before we could announce it, and therefore it could not be shown in this picture, although it was ready—tested and approved—the day before this advertisement was written.

It is a folding cot—either double or single—a bedding roll and a tent, all in one. It can be set up in a few minutes in any convenient place and can likewise be folded quickly and attached to the running board of any automobile.

In the Wilson "Restgood" line of bed rolls and campers' equipment we make pretty nearly everything the tourist or camper needs for his comfort—good, durable things that are worth every cent you pay for them. A few are illustrated herewith. Ask your dealer for them.

men to organize but not direct recognition of the organization. It would also involve freedom from strikes for the duration of the war.

AUSTRIANS LOSE BATTLESHIP. Two Italian Torpedo boats, in a daring attack at dawn on June 10, succeeded in reaching the Austrian fleet steaming from Pola to Cattaro, among the Dalmatian Islands, sinking the Austrian dreadnought Viribus Unitis, of 20,000 tons, and damaging another battleship. Of the crew of 1,000 of the sunken ship, over 80 were reported missing.

WILSON URGES SUFFRAGE. Replying through the National Woman's Suffrage Association to a memorial from the French Union for Woman's Suffrage, President Wilson on June 13 declared "that the services of women during this supreme crisis in the world's history have been of the most signal usefulness and distinction. The war could not have been fought without them; nor its sacrifices endured. It is high time that some part of our debt of gratitude to them should be acknowledged and paid, and the only acknowledgment they ask is their admission to suffrage. Can we justly refuse it? As for America, it is my earnest hope that the Senate of the United States will give an unmistakable answer to this question by passing the Suffrage Amendment."

TO BLOCKADE OUR COAST. Dispatches from Amsterdam on June 13 quoted reports received from Berlin to the effect that the German Admiralty intended to declare the eastern coast of the United States, from Mexico to Canada, a danger zone, and to warn neutral shipping to keep away from American ports.

Inasmuch as Germany has been sinking ships without formal notice off the American coast, the formal announcement would make little difference in the established facts.

GERMAN DEATH RATE GROWS. Through the American Intelligence Service it was announced on June 12 that on May 8 a meeting of scientists and physicians at Heidelberg sent resolutions to the Kaiser and Chancellor, demanding immediate governmental aid to combat serious health conditions. The resolution gave the death rate among infants, women and children at 68 per thousand, pointed out the increasing peril to the German civilian population due to malnutrition, and declared that sanitary conditions were bad and getting worse.

MAY EXTEND DRAFT AGES. Representative Kahn, of California, member of the House Committee on Military Affairs, declared on June 13, that it would be necessary for the government to place in France an army of 8,000,000 men, and that to do this it would be necessary to raise the draft age to 45 years, or possibly to 49, and that it might be necessary to lower the age to 18. The placing of the draft ages at 18 to 45 or 49 would also greatly simplify the operation of the treaties with France and England for the mutual drafting of citizens.

The Progress of the War

IT is now known that the 23d and 9th Regulars were fighting with the American Marines who drove the Germans back on the point of the Marne salient and took Bouresches and Belleau. They found the woods of Belleau a hard nut to crack. Direct attacks were in vain, as the Germans had the woods too well organized with machine guns too numerous and too well concealed. Consequently the Americans swept past on both sides. On June 10 the American and French artillery swept the woods backward and forward with fire from batteries of all caliber, and on the morning of the 11th the American troops, marines and regulars, cleaned up the woods. There was some interesting fighting with hand grenades and bayonets and machine guns, but within half an hour the Germans were on the run, although many of them found no place to run to except into the arms of charging Americans. Of the 1,200 who made up the German garrison, some 300 were captured. A very small number may have succeeded in reaching the German lines farther east; the majority paid the ultimate penalty.

Having been defeated eight times in eight days, the Germans, on June 13, launched a formidable attack against the Americans in Bouresches and northward to Torcy. The attack was made with troops of the 5th Guard and the 28th German divisions, Germany's best, who had been sent in with definite instructions to defeat the Americans. A few Germans entered Bouresches, but none left it, except as prisoners, and the Germans swarming over the railroad east of the town were slaughtered in masses by the French and American artillery and machine guns. The attack was completely repelled, and a considerable number of prisoners were taken, making the total captures of the American troops in this region, in the week that they had been fighting, in the neighborhood of 1,000 men. They also captured two German field guns, a large number of trench mortars, and many machine guns.

The announcement was made by Secretary Baker, on June 14, that our men were to be withdrawn gradually from the British and French divisions with which they have been brigaded, and would fight together as American units. Secretary Baker also said that 500,000 American troops had landed in France since March 21, that the first shipment of American heavy artillery, 24 eight-inch howitzers, had been made, that 2,000 Liberty motors had been delivered, that 200 airplanes had been sent abroad, and that 400 more were ready for shipment. It was announced on June 15 that America then had over 800,000 troops in France and that the number would be nearly 1,000,000 early in July.

THE American troops at Cantigny and in Lorraine maintained active raiding during the week; the artillery back of Cantigny shelling heavily the country north and east of Montdidier in order to prevent any extension westward of the German offensive. The German offensive southward from Noyon and Lassigny was countered by the French on June 11. Their attacks drove the Germans back along the Allied left wing, retaking the villages of Courcelles and Mery, and driving the Germans from the Aronde River back to the Matz. The French at the same time withdrew their right wing, crossing the Oise south of Noyon, and drew back their troops on the eastern bank of the Oise so that the line from the junction of the Matz and Oise ran through Bailly and Tracy-le-Val to Nampcel. This position the French maintained against furious German attacks on the 12th and 13th. The Germans shifted their attack on the 13th to the line southward from Soissons to Villers Cotterets, where they succeeded in making an advance north of the forest on a narrow front of about a mile and a half in the Ravine of Laversine. Further desperate assaults registered no gain, and on the 14th the whole front was comparatively inactive except in the region of Antheuil, northwest of Compiègne, where the French broke up an enemy attack. In the attacks southward from Noyon the Germans used in the neighborhood of 350,000 men, against an enemy fully prepared and ready. At the cost of enormous losses they gained at the deepest point no more than seven miles. Compiègne, the objective set for the second day's fighting, was still five miles away from the closest German troops, and the fourth great drive had ended in a sanguinary defeat. The Germans claimed the capture of 15,000 French soldiers and 150 guns. The French captured several thousand Germans, and at least 19 German guns.

American airmen, operating for the first time without British or French companions, on June 13 raided the German camps, railways and factories north of Matz, dropping 80 bombs on the station and neighboring buildings at Conflans. Although attacked by anti-aircraft guns and by enemy flyers the squadron returned intact.

The British, although keeping all their sectors of the battle line in suspense by constant raids, made two assaults during the week in which they took ground from the Germans. On June 10 Australian troops took a small ridge near Strazeele south of Morlan-court, on the apex of the Amiens salient, taking in the neighborhood of 300 prisoners, advancing over a four-thousand yard front to a depth of over 700 yards, driving the Germans from the heights into the swamp. On June 15 Gen. Haig's men on a front of about two miles north of Bethune, took the forward German positions and about 200 prisoners.

Austria, on June 15, began the great offensive for which the Allied world has been waiting more than two months. After an intense artillery fire, along the whole Italian front from the Trentino to the mouth of the Piave, the Austrians launched their storming troops against the Italian positions over a front of more than 100 miles. The attack was blocked at every point. Desperate attempts to advance in the Brenta valley and to take the mountain positions on the Asiago Plateau resulted in slight penetrations which were promptly driven back and the line rectified. Along the Piave the Austrians succeeded in reaching the western bank at two places near Nervesa and near Fagare. On June 17, the Italians were attacking fiercely and the battle raged about these two bridgeheads. The Austrians claimed the capture of 10,000 prisoners and some guns. The Allies held 3,000 prisoners, including eighty-nine officers.

Six hundred German shock troops attacked the American line near Xivray northwest of Toul on June 16. Although penetrating the village, the enemy was thrown back with considerable loss in killed and prisoners. It was also announced on the 16th that American troops were now holding a portion of the line east of Belfort in German Alsace.

The American transport, Neuces, was sunk, in collision off the British coast, on June 15, during a dense fog. No lives were lost.

Does the Bible Throw Light on This War?

is the title of the first chapter of Dr. Scofield's latest book, "What Do the Prophets Say?" In this book he gives the results of his life-time study of the Bible in relation to God's foretelling of his purposes for Israel, for the Church and for the World.

If you have felt the need in your own study of Bible prophecy, of a volume giving the sane and guarded utterance of a mature student of the Scriptures, is the book you have been awaiting. "Does the Bible Throw Light on This War?" the title of the first chapter gives a suggestion of the riches that abound in every page of this notable work.

Some of your friends would be delighted to be initiated into the riches and blessings of the truth of Prophecy. This book will prove a memorable gift to them.

A complete index of 433 separate Scripture passages cited, and a full Topical Index covering 699 separate subjects, make it easy to find what you are looking for.

Books Worth While

A Minstrel in France. By Harry Lauder. International Library Company. $2.

HERE is a book on the war, totally different from any other. Nearly every English-speaking person knows of Harry Lauder, by name at least, and many, many tens of thousands in the British Empire and America have listened to him sing in the long years in which he has been before the public professionally. Of those tens of thousands it is safe to say that very few would have dreamed that this singer of songs of the moment could ever write such a book as this "Minstrel in France," at once a vivid picture of the everyday life of the men on the battle-front, and a prose poem on the theme of paternal love.

John Lauder, Harry Lauder's only son, was killed in the concluding phase of the long-drawn-out Battle of the Somme. The sniper's bullet which pierced his heart broke his father's as well, and it is from this broken heart that the father sings. First, of the boy as a little lad, then as a youth; then of him at the university on the Cam, and how he was soon to go to London "to be a barrister in wig and gown." Then the great war broke out, and John, like many another brave Scottish lad, buckled on a sword and went to Flanders to fight for his country and his king. Wounded once, twice, the second time coming home for a while, the boy captain went back to the battle front. Then, as the book tells us, early in the morning of New Year's Day, 1917, a brief, terrible telegram came to the father, which said: "Captain John Lauder killed in action, December 28. Official, War Office." Whereupon the joy in life of that father faded, though not, as we shall see, his hope.

Poetry is poetry because of the emotion and sentiment expressed, and not merely because of the metrical form of expression. All through Harry Lauder's story one can feel love, joy, pride and sorrow, the strongest emotions of the heart, vibrating. Here is one example out of many:

No one spoke. But the soldier pointed silently and eloquently to one brown mound in a row of brown mounds which looked alike, each like the other. Then he drew away. . . . And so I went alone to my boy's grave and flung myself down upon the warm, friendly earth. My memories of that moment are not very clear; but I think that for a few minutes I was utterly spent—that my collapse was complete!

He was such a good boy. . . . As I lay there on that brown mound under the June sun that day, all he had been, and all he meant to me and to his mother, came rushing back to my memory, opening anew my wounds of grief. I thought of him as a baby, and as a wee laddie, beginning to run around and talk to us. I thought of him in every phase and bit of his life, and of the friends we had always been, he and I! Such chums we were, always!

Again there came to me, as I lay there, the same gracious solace that God had given me after his glorious death. And I knew that this dark grave, so sad and lonely and forlorn, was but the temporary bivouac of my boy. I knew that it was no more than a trench of refuge against the storm of battle in which he was resting until that hour when we shall all be reunited beyond the shadowy borderland of death!

If this, in its essential elements, be not poetry, what name shall we give it?

After the freshness of the shock of John's death had passed, Harry Lauder felt what may be described as a "call," in almost the old-fashioned religious sense of that word, to do something for his boy's comrades, the British soldiers in the field. Nor could this desire be satisfied in any vicarious fashion. The call was too personal for that, and demanded that Harry himself should give his "first-fruits." As he says, "I wanted to go up to the battle lines themselves and to sing for the boys who were in the thick of the struggle with the Hun."

After much trouble, the necessary permission was secured, and in automobiles arranged for the purpose, "The Reverend Harry Lauder M. P. Tour" as the soldiers called it, made the rounds of the first-line trenches on the Flanders front. Hence this book, with its series of very realistic pictures of that front, of the men on it and the manner of their life. The concerts were nearly all given under peculiar conditions, which are picturesquely described. At Vimy Ridge, for instance, Lauder sang under fire to an active Canadian battery, in an amphitheatre whose acoustics, he says, were "splendid," which had been dug out the day before by a huge and obliging German shell. On another occasion, near Arras, in a very advanced trench, about in the middle of the concert the Germans commenced to hurl "whizz bangs" (a sort of giant fire-cracker) into the auditorium, with the result that performer and audience simultaneously and rapidly disappeared into the dugouts in the side of the trench.

There is much kindly humor in the book, which is also enlivened by some very good stories. But its great strength lies in the extremely well-drawn pictures of the British soldier, whom he thoroughly understands.

In the last chapter but one, Mr. Lauder tells in a compelling fashion of the fund he is raising of a million pounds to give maimed Scottish soldiers a fresh start in life. Taken as a whole, "The Minstrel in France" deserves rank as one of the half-dozen best books on the human side of the war, written in English.

Howard Chase, Red Hill, Kansas. By Rev. Charles M. Sheldon. George H. Doran Company. $1.25.

THIS story recently ran as a serial in these columns, and is therefore well known to our readers.

There is one sentence in the book so universal in its application, yet so often totally ignored, that it may be worth while to recall it:

"The absence of evil does not always argue the presence of good."

The present publication gives the opportunity of securing this Christian story in permanent form.

The Dry-Dock of a Thousand Wrecks. By Philip I. Roberts. Introduction by John Henry Jowett. D. D. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.

AN extremely interesting and true narration of some of the good which has been accomplished by the celebrated McAuley Water Street Mission in reclaiming and restoring to a useful life men who had descended to the utmost depths. Told in vigorous and well-chosen English, the story is at once inspiring and encouraging. The author has strengthened the book by permitting the character concerning whom he writes to tell his own story in his own words. A very practical testimony of the value of earnest effort to bring the saving grace of Jesus Christ even to those who have fallen furthest.

Dr. Jowett's introduction brings out in vivid relief the uselessness of mere human influences, unsupported by the spiritual, in cases of this kind.

Crimes of Charity. By Konrad Berecovic. With an introduction by John Reed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1917.

THE author, apparently a man of sensitive feelings, describes, in a vigorous and sometimes forcible manner, his experiences as a special investigator of applications for relief on behalf of an unnamed Charity Organization. The results of this experience have led Mr. Berecovic to frame a strenuous indictment against the system of organized charity itself and also against the effects of that system on the minds and moral characters of the poor.

Undoubtedly organized charity, like every other human institution, has its defects, probably the greatest of which is that habit often makes the human instruments used to distribute relief come to view applicants therefor in the light of "cases," and not of human beings. As a result, the real spirit of charity vanishes.

Nevertheless, in this book it would seem as though Mr. Berecovic had so persistently fastened his gaze on the defects of organized charity that he had allowed its merits to escape him. The book, however, can be recommended to those engaged in charitable work, as a deterrent from certain rather prevalent weaknesses in themselves.

I SAW a great "Win the War" parade recently. I saw thousands of patriotic people marching up Fifth Avenue—mothers, there were, and Civil War veterans, and boys in khaki who had faced machine gun fire somewhere in France. I saw stolid Indians—representatives of the world's oldest democracy—and men from the Orient; I saw cowboys, and school girls, and little yellow-haired children. And they were all marching under the same flag—the Stars and Stripes.

Standing in the crowd on the pavement I felt myself growing prouder and prouder. I wanted to shout aloud, "It's my flag, too, my flag." And all about me I could see the same sort of pride reflected on the faces of other folk who felt as I felt.

It is a marvelous thing to see the symbol of a nation go by to the accompaniment of reverently uncovered heads and stirring music. For it brings home a great truth—a truth that our boys Over There are fighting for, and dying for.

I am sure that you feel the pride in your nation's flag that I feel. And if you do—if you honor that flag and the men who are upholding it—you should have it in your home.

THESE are strenuous times. They are the times when the real patriot makes his patriotism known. And the simplest, most effective way to do that is to show the colors of patriotism—the Red, White and Blue.

All for Christ: Our Abilities
Christian Endeavor & B. Y. P. U. Topic, Matt. 25: 14-30

THERE is a hymn that runs:

"Jesus paid it all;
All to Him I owe."

A great many people dwell on the first line, and appear to forget the second. All that we have of joy and of good, we owe to Christ. Salvation from sin is ours through His blood. Liberty, freedom of conscience, of thought and education, and the opportunity to make the most of ourselves, all are sure through the influence of His spirit upon human affairs. Therefore, we owe to Him a debt which we can never repay. All of us have certain abilities which are part of us, and which are ours through no virtue of our own. These too we owe to Him. We may not think our talents very great. We are not responsible for their value but only for their use. The man in the parable who tried hardest to save his talent lost it and gained only a reproof. Those who risked their talents gained both others and their Master's commendation. Talents and abilities vary. Some excel in prayer; some in testimony, some in music, some in good fellowship, all are necessary to the success of the Young People's movement. Whatever our talents let us be sure that none are withheld; that all are fully employed in the Master's service, that we may hear His "Well done," when we report to Him.

All for Christ: My Time

Epworth League Topic, Heb. 13: 15, Eccl. 12: 1-7

THIS topic is closely akin to the one above. For the same reason that our talents should all be consecrated to the Saviour, so also should be our time, for time and talents are indivisible. All our talents are His. In the employing of them for Him, we will have consecrated all of our time as well. Therefore, whether we work or play; whether we worship or make holiday, let us do it as unto Him, remembering that through His sacrifice we are saved, and that through our lives, others must

The United States Employment Service

WHEN the United States entered the war, labor conditions had already radically changed from those to which we were accustomed before the great war. The army of the unemployed had already been disbanded. Immigration had almost ceased, and every available arm was at work supplying Europe with munitions and food. But when we entered the war, a greatly increased demand was at once made on American labor; the draft took workers away from farms and shops that could ill spare them; industry was demoralized, and there was at once a general scramble for the labor that was still employable. The private employment agencies and labor exchanges only added to the confusion, as each one was looking out for its own particular interest.

It was soon seen that the great need was a central agency that could act as a clearing-house. In January, 1918, the Department of Labor organized the United States Employment Service, which has since extended its activities over the country, having over 340 branch offices, which place in employment from 150,000 to 175,000 persons a month. A corps of traveling examiners is kept busy seeking men fitted for the varied industries which demand helpers. Third and fourth class postmasters and letter carriers are ex-officio come to know of Him. If we deny Him one minute, and within that minute we live carelessly, we may miss the opportunity of a lifetime to influence another soul for the Kingdom. Such opportunities frequently do not return, but when we meet them fully in his strength we fit ourselves for wider service in which we would have fallen had we failed before. Many a man has missed greatness and has been doomed to mediocrity by half an hour, or perhaps half a minute of failure, or by the length of time it takes to become fearful or to make a wrong decision. Many another has been raised from mediocrity to fame by calling on Christ for help and giving forward to the task he feared. The golden bowl of our future may easily be broken by a few minutes' denial of our Lord, and the silver cord of our service parted by a thoughtless failure to remember that we are His; the fountain of our happiness may be stilled by a whim of selfishness that denies a minute needed by our Lord; but our whole life is glorified by the hour and minutes in which his spirit has free course in us.

A Cornfield in Palestine

THE evangelists tell the story of the walk of Jesus and his disciples through the cornfield on the Sabbath day, and how the disciples, being hungry, began to pick the ears of corn and eat them. It may have been just such a field as that shown in the cover illustration. These modern bridle-paths through the grainfields are found all up and down in the grain-growing districts of the Holy Land. Usually, it is a narrow road for men and horses, which has not been subjected to the plow, and the soil of which is beaten hard by frequent travel. It was doubtless with such a road in his mind that our Lord spoke the parable of the sower (Luke 8: 5), who, sowing his seed, let some fall by the wayside, where it was trodden down and the fowls of the air devoured it. The modest bridle-path which crosses the grainfield is really a considerable factor in the comfort and convenience of the people of Palestine.

Harry Lauder's
GREAT BOOK

"A Minstrel in France"

A story that thrills and inspires

Harry Lauder has dealt wondrously with the human side of the war. He tells us of the men in the trenches and their bravery in battle, how they pass their few hours of leisure in the Y. M. C. A. huts or rest camps, and what they are thinking about the great cause for which they are ready to give up their lives. He relates how he sang to these war-worn veterans on the shell-sweet fighting line, and describes the enthusiastic reception they gave him. He tells of his visits to the hospitals and his cheering talks with the wounded.

LAUGHTER, HEARTBREAK AND TEARS

"Wonderful are the words of Harry Lauder! The laughter of the great Scotchman is tremulous with heartbreak and tears. But calamity actually soothes the sorrows of the grave. The man of mirth is anointed and ordained to teach. Death has filled him with a mighty inspiration."

Christian Evangelist (St. Louis.)

Harry Lauder's book thrills the reader. From beginning to end it rivets attention. In the narration of his story the famous Scotchman has a great purpose. He writes so that America may know more of the meaning of war, its cost, its agony, its call to every one of us, from voices mute as well as from the terrible roar of guns, to prepare to face the shadows which every day are creeping nearer to our homes and our fire-sides. He has, moreover, a message of comfort and good cheer for those whose sons have been summoned to the camps or the fighting line.

GRIPS, AROUSES, INSPIRES!

"Harry Lauder grips your heart, arouses you, inspires you. As a singer and comedian you love him, and as a war-figure you love him all the more. His message is homely phrased, personal—intimately so—pathetic, inspiring."

Ohio State Journal.

Harry Lauder witnessed the awful desolation in No Man's Land—the scene of constant alarms, trench-raiding and fierce hand-to-hand fighting. He saw, on every side, evidences of the wanton destruction wrought by the German invaders of France and Belgium, and the barbarous cruelties they had inflicted. So vivid is his picture that the reader gets an instant impression of the fighting men of the allied armies—French, Belgian, British, Canadian, Anzac.

STRAIGHT FROM THE HEART

"Harry Lauder's sincerity comes from the heart. His thrilling words carry the conviction that the Allied Cause is just, and that victory must come. He has been through the Slough of Despond, he has drunk the bitter dregs of grief, and he has been close to the Valley of the Shadow of Death. But he has come up to the light a victor over despondency and gloom. He has a message of wondrous cheer."

Questions and Answers

V. E. B., Russellville, Ark. In Christ's last will and testament, recorded in John 14, he tells his disciples what he will do for their consolation and help. Knowing the faintness of their hearts at losing their Lord and Master, he promises them the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, to be with them as the representative of their Lord. Jesus continues to be our Advocate with the Father (1 John 2:1), while the Holy Spirit, abiding with us, represents Jesus gone to the Father. What Christ has been to the disciples, his representative would be thereafter—a Guide, a Comforter, a Strengthened, and a Teacher. He is the Spirit of truth; his very essence is truth and the medium by which truth comes to man. Christ's prediction and promises as to the Holy Spirit were fulfilled in Jerusalem when, by visible signs and by the action on the recipients, the Holy Ghost was poured out upon the Apostles and began to dwell within them, making them Christ-like and true followers of Him who had promised.

G. H. W., Mexico, N. Y. Tradition, that perverter of facts, has said many things to bolster up alleged claims. Much has been said about the probable fate of the rich young man who went away saddened when Christ told him to sell his all and give to the poor. The greater part of this kind of Bible biography is, unfortunately, pure conjecture.

Any reader of this journal knowing the address of Fred Elsworth Bartlett will confer a favor by sending it to Mrs. I. F. Sawyer, San Ysidro, Calif.

A. H., Quinhagak, Alaska, writes: "In the Christian Herald of November 14 (page 1196) is a statement which must contain an error. It is concerning the weight of deer. If a deer weighs 250 pounds, it is considered a very large one. The largest in my experience of eighteen years was 258 pounds, dressed. We consider a deer butcherable and full grown when it is four years old, and on good pasture it should be from 175 to 200 pounds. Of course, if they can run to be older, it adds some to their weight. We here do not know that skins have been sold by the pound, but always the whole skin from $2 to $10 according to size and quality."

Rev. Clinton D. Day, Parma, Idaho, writes: "Your excellent answers to correspondents in the Mail-Bag department I always read with pleasure. Rarely do I differ from your answers. In the issue of April 17, you answer the question of D. L., of Keokuk, Iowa. Matthew, Mark and Luke locate the place where Jesus was baptized as being in 'the wilderness of Judea' (Matt. 3:1, Mark 1:4, Luke 3:4). A ford of the Jordan River near Gilgal, not far from Jericho, is generally believed to be the place where he was baptized, and to that ford pilgrims go annually. Second, John the Baptist fulfilled his ministry at three places: At the Gilgal ford; at Bethabara; at Enon near to Salim. Jesus was the last person baptized at the Gilgal ford by John the Baptist (Luke 3:21). Dr. Alfred Edersheim has unhappily confused Bible readers and a certain number of Biblical scholars by naming the Gilgal ford Bethabara. The evidence for a ford some distance north from Gilgal is that Major Conder found the name Abarah in one place only, and it does not recur in the ten thousand names collected during the survey. It was applied by the Arabs to one of the chief fords leading over to Bashan, in the vicinity of Bethshean, where the road from Galilee comes down the tributary valley of Jezreel (Palestine, pp. 73, 74). John the Evangelist, who names one of the Jordan fords Bethabara in his Gospel, was not describing events connected with the baptism of Jesus, but events that occurred more than forty days after the temptation of Jesus. After the baptism, came the temptation, and directly after the temptation the visit of Jesus to his friend and servant and forerunner John. Notice the tenses in John 1:32, 'I have beheld'; verse 34, 'and I have seen.' While performing his ministry he is recalling the great event that took place at Gilgal 'in the wilderness of Judea.' The third day after John testified that Jesus was the Lamb of God, Jesus and his disciples were at a wedding at Cana, Galilee. John the Disciple, whom Jesus loved, does not write what the synoptists wrote, but adds to the life of Christ facts not recorded by the other writers. He is the only one who tells of the incidents at Bethabara and Cana, and of the deputation sent from Jerusalem (John 1:19). Nor did any other writer tell of the third baptizing place at Enon, near to Salim (John 3:23). The people of Gilgal ford, where John baptized the divine Lamb, are Judeans (Matt. 3:5); the people whom Jesus met at the Bethabara ford were Galileans."

Church Pennant Flying from the Battleship
New York

THIS flag, white with a blue cross, has been adopted by the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, in agreement with the National Catholic War Council and with the consent of the Government, as a flag for all the churches to be used as a symbol of their patriotic faith and zeal. It may be retained and used after the war as a flag representing the church, a flag of worship and service to be used wherever it is deemed appropriate by the churches. When a religious service is being held on board ship the flag will fly above the Stars and Stripes.

T. M. P., Statesville, N. C. The custom of burying the dead with head toward the west refers only to the clergy. The usual posture of burial is with the feet eastward, facing the dawn, also in consequence of the tradition relative to the position of Christ's body in the tomb. The custom arose in the Church of burying the clergy in a reversed position. The doctrine suggested by such burial was that these men would arise and follow their Master as he came from the east.

H. H. D., Wheaton, Minn. The Pension Office informs us that according to the Act of March 3, 1910, a pension may be restored to a woman who was the lawful wife of a soldier during the period of service in any war, and who had been pensioned as his widow on proof that his death was due to service; and whose name was dropped from the roll on account of her remarriage to another man, who has since died or from whom she has been divorced on her own application and without fault on her part; provided she is without other means of support other than her daily labor. A woman who thinks she is eligible for a pension should communicate with the Commissioner of Pensions, Pension Office, Washington, D. C., stating the facts of the case.

Mrs. N. W. K., Perrin, Tenn. The mind of a child is a wonderful field for study. It has always seemed to us that the childish imagination should be guided and gently trained, rather than repressed. Many seeming absurdities in childhood are purely the result of a lively imagination. We remember a little lad who acted in play as though he always had beside him an invisible companion, whom he would address as freely as though a real flesh-and-blood playfellow were present. In which he treats of the fancies and moods of the juvenile imagination, which is in many cases an endowment or "gift" not to be treated harshly, but guided and cultivated and trained in the right direction. Individual temperament should be studied carefully, and the knowledge of truth and honor are essential parts of such a training.

W. M. P., Mexico, Texas. The government is considering any war invention offered it by civilians throughout the country. Land warfare inventions should be referred to Colonel George L. Anderson, Board of Ordnance and Fortification, Washington, D. C. Naval warfare inventions should be referred to Thomas Robbins, secretary of the Naval Council Board, 13 Park Row, New York City.

Reader, Franklin, O. America is never ungenerous in responding to the call of suffering. On the contrary, there is no nation on earth that gives so liberally or so quickly. Our national benevolences have been amazing, and more so than ever since the war began. It is true, the resources of the nation are very great, and these have hardly been touched to any appreciable extent; but America will not shrink at sacrifice. We are literally "feeding the world" today, and a very large proportion of American homes are living on war diet, cutting out everything in the form of luxury.

E. D. B., Washington, D. C. Liberty Bonds and War Savings Stamps are not benevolence but investments, and therefore should not be included in your accounts as benevolences.

G. B. W., Bethany, Neb. We fear there are many who would regard the interpretations to which you refer as of the freak variety, and rather out of place in any serious discussion.

W. C. B. T., Blossburg, Pa., discussing the Christian Herald's reference to Archbishop Lang, the Primate of England, rightly reminds us that the Archbishop of Canterbury is the "Primate of All England." The distinction is a fine one, but ecclesiastically correct.

I. S. M., Madison, Wis. While your letter was on the way to us, your hope and that of your associates in the First Baptist Church of Madison, was in process of being realized. In his proclamation of a day of national prayer, humiliation and fasting, and also of prayer for victory in our war for righteousness, the universal desire of God's people finds the response they looked for. We have had many letters on the subject.

A reader in Ironbridge, Pa., sends this cheering note: "Your paper is the best I've ever read. Every paragraph is full of Christian spirit and helpfulness. I am trying to live a Christian life and this paper is a great help." Such a letter gladdens the heart and makes us both humble and thankful.

F. McD., Davenport, Ia. "Buy the truth and sell it not" is a very old proverb. And by the wise and spiritual of all the ages truth has been held the most precious thing in the world. Jesus was the Truth incarnate and His teaching was its exemplification. Truth is so precious that no man can pay too high a price for it; so rare that one might go through the whole of life without finding it; so noble that once seen its beauty can never be effaced from memory, so pure that spring water and the polished crystal are dull beside it, so strong that it will break in pieces the stoutest opponent, and so bright that none but the pure can bear to look upon it. God is Truth.

Mrs. R. E. V., Hutchinson, Kans. 1. Please make your first question plainer. 2. There is no contradiction in John 6:37, 39, 44 and V. 40. In the latter, we pass from the thought of the general body of the church to that of individual members, all of whom are embraced in the Father's will. All who believe on the Son, render obedience to the Father.

W. G. R., Savannah, Ga., writes: "In five states alone there are 1,500,000 acres planted in tobacco. If converted by sowing in wheat, would maintain an army of 300,000 for twelve months. Whatever is a factor to win or lose this war is not too insignificant to be considered. The vital necessity is in proportion to its factors. Thrift is practical patriotism. A filthy and heathenish habit is in no way a factor to conserve food. The farmer is patriotic, the latter not patriotic. Might not we ask the war saving societies to take the advantage of our right to urge that Congress pass a bill according to the facts?"

C. S. S., Malta, Ohio. 1. There is ordinarily no special significance to dreams. They may be the result of a number of causes and the instances of revelation being given in dreams are rare. 2. Trust in God's wisdom and will and in your desire to be near to him. 3. Many earnest Christians cannot always memorize favorite passages. This leads them to read anew in the great Book, and by searching they gain new help and inspiration.

Grow "Younger" As You Grow Older

Younger in Body, Younger in Spirit Younger in Ambition Younger in Every Characteristic that Gives Greater Earning and Living Power, Greater Thought Power, Greater Pleasure Obtaining Power and Greater Health Promoting Power

THE number of years a man has lived does not tell how old or young he is. A man is as old or as young as his energy, his vitality, his capacity for work and play, his resisting power against disease and fatigue. A man is only as old or as young as his memory power, will power, sustained-thought power, personality power, concentration power and brain power. He is only as old or as young as his digestive power, his heart power, his lung power, his kidney power, his liver power. Age is measured by the age of our cells, tissues and organs, and not by the calendar!

Cultivate the Cells

Everybody knows that the body and brain are made up of millions of tiny cells. We can be no younger than those cells are young. We can be no more efficient in any way than those cells are efficient. We can be no more energetic than the combined energy of those cells.

By conscious cultivation of these cells, it is as natural as the law of gravity that we become more efficient, more alive, more energetic, more ambitious, more enthusiastic, more youthful. By consciously developing the cells in our stomachs we must improve our digestion. By consciously developing the cells in the heart we must increase its strength in exact proportion. By consciously developing the brain cells the result can only be multiplied brain power—and so with every organ in the body.

What we are and what we are capable of accomplishing depends entirely and absolutely on the degree of development of our cells. They are the sole controlling factors in us. We are only as young and as great and as powerful as they are.

There Is No Fraud Like Self-Deception

You may think you are young, strong, brainy, energetic, happy, yet when compared with other men or women, you are old, weak, dull, listless and unhappy. You do not know what you are capable of accomplishing because you have not begun to develop the real vital powers within you. The truth is you are only a dwarf in health and mind when you can easily become a giant through conscious development of every cell, tissue and organ in your body and brain. By accelerating the development of the powers within you, you can actually become younger, as you grow older—yes younger in every way that will contribute to your health, happiness and prosperity

Conscious Evolution—the Secret

Swoboda proves that Conscious Evolution gives energy and vitality to spare, digestive power to spare, self-reliance to spare, and gives many other desirable characteristics to spare. He proves that Conscious Evolution makes people disease-proof, fatigue-proof. He maintains that to possess sufficient vitality and energy and to keep the body in normal health under the most favorable conditions is no more health prosperity than to have only enough money from day to day to meet current expenses. Great reserve health, great reserve energy is what we must acquire if we are to successfully nullify the ravages of time, and to easily overcome every adverse condition and thus enjoy the benefit of our resources, the benefit of our health power and the advantage of our energy.

Beware of Health Poverty

As Swoboda says "there are individuals who seek work only when their last cent is gone. Likewise, individuals live from minute to minute and from day to day, seeking health and energy only as they need them badly. Conscious Evolution is for them—for everyone. It is a simple, scientific and practical system by means of which every part of the brain and body is energized, strengthened, awakened, so that we become possessed of a super health and mentality—the Swoboda kind of health and mentality. Conscious Evolution makes for good fortune by developing the resources and the ability and power of personality.

Strange as it may seem, this revolutionary method of consciously awakening and developing weakened and lifeless cells requires no drugs, medicines or apparatus of any kind. It does not require dieting, deep breathing, excessive exercising, cold baths, electricity or massage. It takes only a few minutes a day, yet so startling is the effect of Swoboda's system that you begin to feel younger, renewed, revitalized, re-energized after the very first day.

WHAT OTHERS HAVE TO SAY:

"Conscious Evolution has done all for me that you promised and I am simply radiating good health. I can hardly believe it myself, it has made such a great change in me. I am in better condition than I have been for twenty years and am chock full of energy and ambition. Tasks that were a burden to me in the past are now easy and a pleasure. I have no money to burn or throw to the birds, but if you were to offer me one thousand dollars in good hard cash and put me back where I was before beginning your system, I would say, 'Nothing doing.' I enjoy the work you have mapped out for me and am impatient to get at it."

"I SHALL BE SIXTY-SIX YEARS OLD NEXT AUGUST and if you were to see me right now you would say 'forty,' and, as a fact, I am better, stronger, and have more energy than the average man at forty. I have only you and your system to thank for these things, and I want to thank you from the very bottom of a grateful heart for what you have done for me. I am a man now in every sense of the word, whereas I was only a fraction of a man and rather a small fraction before profiting through Conscious Evolution."

"The strangest part of it all is that my hearing is greatly improved. The muscles of my shoulders, back and abdomen are immense, and I have forgotten that I have a liver, kidneys, heart, or any other organs, except my stomach which makes a loud call three times a day. I have lost all desire for stimulants."

"I AM SEVENTY-ONE YEARS OF AGE, and in three weeks your system has apparently made a new man of me. I am so enthusiastic over Conscious Evolution that it is difficult for me to control myself, and not do more than you say. I want to thank you for the interest you are taking in my case. When I wrote you for your instructions I was in a very desperate condition. I have never been sorry for one minute that I have written you. On the contrary, I want to thank you for what you are doing for me. I am getting along fine; I am a wonder to myself. It does not seem possible that there could be such a change in any one in such a short time."

"When I tell some of my friends how quickly I was benefited by Conscious Evolution, they do not believe me. They think I exaggerate."

"One year ago I was an old man at forty; to-day I am a youth at forty-one."

"I must state that the principle of your system is the most scientific, and at the same time the simplest, I have ever heard. You do not misrepresent one single word in your advertising."

"Just think of it, five weeks ago I was ashamed of my physique; today I am almost proud of it. I am delighted with Conscious Evolution."

"My reserve force makes me feel that nothing is impossible, my capacity both physically and mentally is increasing daily."

"I am very thankful that the Lord directed me to Conscious Evolution through the 'Christian Herald.'"

These Amazing Books Are For You

Swoboda has published for distribution two remarkable books which explain his system of Conscious Evolution and what it has already done. Write for these books—not because Conscious Evolution has meant so much to 262,000 other men and women, not because there is scarcely a prominent family in the country that hasn't at least one member a pupil of Swoboda, including Charles E. Hughes, Woodrow Wilson, Rockefeller, the Vanderbilts, the Goulds, the Huntingtons, the Cudahys, the Swifts, Dr. J. H. Jowett—but write for these books because they mean so much to YOU in multiplied living power, earning power and resisting power. They are big books filled from cover to cover with the vital facts about yourself and how you can acquire the degree of perfection in body and mind that you so much desire. They explain the dangers of excessive deep breathing, excessive exercise, and excessive muscular development.

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" will show you how you can increase the pleasures of life to a maximum—how to intensify them and how to make your life more profitable, pleasurable and joyous.

"Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" are the A, B, C of evolution and persistent youth. These books explain Conscious Evolution and the human body as it has never been explained before. They explain the Swoboda theory and the laws of mind and body. They startle, educate and enlighten. They explain as never before the reason for the evolution of the mind and body.

Regardless of how young you may feel, of how efficient you may think you are—regardless of how active, energetic and alert you may consider yourself—regardless of how happy, how contented you may pride yourself on being—regardless of how healthy, wealthy or successful you may be, you cannot afford, in justice to yourself, to miss the interesting and instructive secrets explained for the first time in these startling new books.

A mere reading of "Conscious Evolution" and "The Science of Life" will so fill you with enthusiasm and ambition, that you will not rest until you have yourself acquired the Swoboda kind of health and energy by cultivation and revitalizing intensively every cell, tissue and organ in your own system. Tear out the coupon on this page, write your name and address on it or write a letter or a postal card and mail it today. Even if you gain but one suggestion from them, you will have been repaid a thousand fold for having read them. I urge you by all means not to delay, not to say, "I'll do it later," but to send NOW, while the matter is on your mind. Remember, these books are absolutely free for you to keep—there is no charge or obligation now or later. Write NOW. Address

A QUIET CANAL IN ZEEBRUGGE BEFORE THE WAR STORM BROKE

Estacada, Oregon.
August 15, 1917.

Dear Ivory Soap People:

I want to tell you what a fairy godmother Ivory soap has been in helping me to get ready for my vacation.

My rather small salary must meet the needs of Little Mother and myself and the upkeep of our small home, therefore a vacation trip means strict economy in planning clothes. Yet I do love to be fresh and dainty so here is where my fairy godmother waves her wand.

First my soiled crape de chine waist went into a basin of warm Ivory suds, was rinsed, dried in a bath towel, carefully pressed, and came out as pretty as when it was new.

Then I sponged my last summer's suit with Ivory suds till it looked bright and fresh.

I had a pair of champagne colored pumps which were much soiled. Ivory paste cleaned them and new bows so transformed them that several have remarked, "What pretty slippers" Yet I had thought them quite beyond hope at the end of last season.

White silk gloves next received the magic touch and now came the question of transforming my black hat, which I had never liked, into something I should enjoy wearing.
A thoro sponging with warm Ivory suds restored its glossiness and made the straw pliable so it was easily bent into another shape. Then I bought a white satin rose and tacked it on jauntily. When my city cousin saw it she said, "Your new hat is awfully cute."

That my hair might lie softly beneath the hat it received an Ivory shampoo. And when my suitcase was packed on the very top lay a new bar of Ivory, for even a fairy godmother must sometimes repeat her magic.

As I reflected happily on how much I owed to Ivory, the thought came to me that perhaps you might use some part of my experience with Ivory for one of your clever advertisements.
If not I shall at least have had the satisfaction of saying a thank you for the happiness Ivory added to my vacation.

Very sincerely yours,

Eva F. W.

Whatever complaints may loosely be made about Army food, none come from the boys at mess-time

The Best-Fed Army and Navy in the World

By CHARLES GRANT MILLER

THE Federal Trade Commission has received no complaint from any source that the government has bought any bad food and served it to soldiers or sailors, at any time during this war.

This clear-cut statement made for the Christian Herald by Chairman W. B. Colver of the Federal Trade Commission, which is investigating certain army supplies, is of tremendous significance.

That the government is serving only the best of food to its defenders everybody has believed, but the fact that even no loose charges to the contrary have ever been made by disgruntled persons is extraordinary indeed.

The Federal Trade Commission's own inquiry had provided the first ground for possible suspicion, that all might not be well in the commissaries, but Chairman Colver's declaration gives full assurance that any suspicion whatever is untenable.

The official inquiry now going on started from complaints that bad beef was found by government inspectors in a private warehouse near an army camp in Texas and that in certain instances navy inspectors had been over-zealous in rejecting beef afterwards found to be good. The investigations going on in New York and elsewhere may afford some salacious grounds for newspaper gossip but none for real doubt as to the high quality of the food of our soldiers and sailors.

THE Christian Herald has made an exhaustive inquiry and finds conditions not only favorable but most admirable. Evidence heaped upon evidence was found showing that the food supply of the army and navy of the United States is high above reproach or even suspicion.

Secretary of War Baker promptly disposed of the popular fallacy that official facts of real interest to the public are hard to get at. "There's not a record in the War Department relating to army food that is not open to the Christian Herald," he said.

"LET none but Americans be on guard" is the good old admonition which is today applied to the army food service. The food for the American Army in France is made in America, transported by America, received abroad in American-built cold storage plants, shipped to the front over American-built railroads and passed out under American inspection. The vigilance of the United States Government is never relaxed for a moment at any point.

The total June food requirements for the American army in France, every pound of which was duly transported during the month, were enormous in quantities as follows:

Beef, fresh, frozen, 32,156,250 lbs.; Bacon, issue, 17,780,000 lbs.; Beef, corned, 7,200,000 lbs.; Beef, fresh, roast, 7,380,000 lbs.; Hash, corned beef, 3,369,500 lbs.; Cornmeal, yellow, 2,600,000 lbs.; Flour, issue, 88,225,000 lbs.; Baking-powder, No. 1 cans, 390,000; Beans, issue, 5,951,981 lbs.; Beans, baked, No. 1 cans, 4,264,000; Beans, baked, No. 3 cans, 6,548,000; Rice, 3,972,000 lbs.; Tomatoes, small cans, 9,750,000; Jam, assorted, No. 2 cans, 2,091,600; Prunes, 744,400 lbs.; Apples, evap., 199,000 lbs.; Peaches, evap., 199,000 lbs.; Sugar, granulated, 16,140,000 lbs.; Milk, evap. pt. cans, 3,234,375; Vinegar, 196,560 gals.; Pickles, cuc., 196,560 gals.; Salt, issue, 852,647 lbs.; Pepper, black, 4 oz. cans, 804,000; Cinnamon, ground, 4 oz. cans, 238,920; Hard Bread, 3,550,000 lbs. (exclusive of reservations, 1,000,000); dehydrated Potatoes, 5,428,977 lbs.; Barley, 370,000 lbs.; Rye, 190,000 lbs.; Hominy, fine, 249,600 lbs.; Lard, issue, 1,560,000 lbs.; Lard, substitute, 1,610,000 lbs.; Butter, issue, 1,219,920 lbs.; Oleomargarine, 1,219,920 lbs.; Syrup, issue, 780,000 gals.; Flaming Ext., ½ L., ½ V., 8 oz. bottle, 137,280; Fish, canned (Salmon), No 1 cans, 4,680,000; Cloves, ground, 4 oz. cans, 20,064; Ginger, ground, 4 oz. cans, 49,620; Nutmeg, whole, 7,600 lbs.

IN the American army in France, as in the navy, wheat bread of the highest quality only is served. The diluted flours are not for the men in the service at the front. The soldier's daily ration is 18 ounces of best wheat flour, made into soft bread, and hard bread is ordered issued only when the interests of the government so require. As substitutes for the wheat bread, if desired, 20 ounces of corn meal and 1.6 ounces of fine hominy are available.

The fresh beef ration for each soldier per day is 20 ounces. Substitutive articles available are 20 ounces of fresh mutton, 12 ounces of bacon, 16 ounces of canned meat, 16 ounces of corned beef hash, fish dried, pickled or canned, and 16 ounces of turkey on Thanksgiving Day and Christmas, when practicable.

Each soldier has a daily allotment of 20 ounces of potatoes, or tomatoes canned or fresh, and other fresh vegetables when they can be obtained in the vicinity or transported in a wholesome condition. The daily portion of sugar is 3.2 ounces, of evaporated, unsweetened milk .5 ounces, of coffee, roasted and ground, 1.12 ounces, of pure butter, .5 ounces. In addition in proper quantities are beans, prunes, syrup, spices and condiments.

These articles in the quantities designated must be served to the mess squads daily, or, if they wish less, the value of what they save at the place and time is turned over to them in money. All food articles served as the regular ration must be supplied through the Quartermaster's Department; but with their extra money mess squads may buy provisions and delicacies to their taste in the markets. It is through this outside buying by mess sergeants that dietary troubles sometimes arise. This was the cause of the complaint in the Texas camp.

IN the American army in France, however, possibility of such trouble is carefully provided against. The Quartermaster Corps is operating in France a huge general store that is supplying merchandise to the men of the American Expeditionary Forces at low prices, lower than retail prices in effect in this country. There is scarcely a need or desire that cannot be filled from the large stocks which are constantly being replenished. Although the men are issued ample rations, the Quartermaster stores are opened to the enlisted men for the purpose of permitting them to add to their menu or to satisfy individual desires for dainties or delicacies. The highest grade of merchandise only is carried in stock so that the men may be sure of having the best, whether in rations or extra supplies.

Meats, groceries, fish, vegetables, notions, toilet articles, smokers' articles and scores of miscellaneous items are included in the published price lists. These lists are made available to each company, and purchases may be made either for cash or on credit.

Secretary of the Navy Daniels beamingly welcomed the inquiry made of him regarding the food of the navy. His secretary, Mr. Jenkins, was "brought up on the Christian Herald." And he proved to have been well brought up. There was no untying of proverbial red tape as he opened the way to Admiral McGowan, who directly controls the food of the navy.

The naval bureau of supplies and accounts is headed by Rear-Admiral Samuel McGowan, paymaster-general of the navy. When the Atlantic fleet went around the world in 1909, Sam McGowan had charge of its supplies and made a mark for efficiency. Now he buys everything the navy needs from anchors to airplanes, from complete equipment of a fleet to toothpicks. That is, the clockwork system he has evolved does it. There is no confusion, no conflict of authority, no differences of opinion in the purchasing department of the navy. There are clear specifications as to the quality of every article to be bought, the lowest bid is accepted, and the article delivered must pass rigid inspections and be up to the specifications. No merchant prince or universal provider of the business world takes greater pride than the navy in carrying a complete stock of everything likely to be asked for by the men or in making prompt deliveries under difficulties to any spot on the globe. And few mercantile concerns do as large a business. For the supply activities of the navy run into the tens of millions of dollars in peace times, while under war pressure they are reckoned in hundreds of millions.

BIDDING has been made easy by the navy's weekly notice of articles that it requires. This is mailed to all business concerns interested—now more than 11,000—and all the articles needed from week to week are listed. There is one door in the navy department through which anybody may walk freely, even now in war times, and that leads to the room where all bids for the navy are opened.

Price is not the first point in naval purchases. Assured quality and promptness of delivery are the prime essentials. When it is remembered that every doubtful dealer means unsatisfactory deliveries and consequent loss in fleet efficiency, it is obvious why the application of any candidate for admission to the bidding list must be and is critically scrutinized. The restrictive measures which have been adopted, by which the most scrupulous care is exercised in placing the names of new firms on the navy's bidding list, will, it is firmly believed, prevent recurrence of the troubles of the Civil War and the war of 1898, and the present war will be perfectly clear of any taint of suspicion in the purchase of naval supplies. Certainly it has been so up to now. As a concrete example of how sharply the lines are being drawn between satisfactory and unsatisfactory contractors, it may be stated that 86 firms have been debarred from the bidding list since July, 1914, and not one has been restored.

THE war has not produced conditions making it necessary for the navy to wish to depart in any way from its previous purchasing procedure. The fact that all purchases of naval supplies, with the exception of three items of ordnance, are centralized in one office has made it possible for the navy to secure adequate supplies to meet all its needs at the most advantageous prices and all in strict accordance with legal requirements—and this without criticism from within or without the service. It has been found unnecessary to throw any veil of secrecy around the navy's business, whereas out and out publicity insures in advance a deal square and true to each bidder, present and absent.

Checking in Quartermaster's stores at a company cook shack

A typical day's ration served on the seized German ships—the biggest transport ships we have—is:

Breakfast	Dinner	Supper
Beef Stew	Pot Roast Beef	Cold Corned Beef
Dumplings	Macaroni	Fried Potatoes
Fresh fruit	Mashed Potatoes	Kidney Beans
Bread, Butter	Rice Pudding	Gingerbread
Coffee	Bread, Butter, Coffee	Bread, Butter, Tea.

The ration varies each day for the two weeks, more or less, of the voyage over.

The navy ration, per man, daily is:

1 pound hard bread (biscuits); 1 1/4 pounds fresh bread; or 1 1/2 pounds flour; 1 pound tinned meat; or 1 1/4 pounds salt meat; or 1 1/4 pounds smoked meat; or 1 1/4 pounds fresh meat; or 1 1/4 pounds fresh fish; or 8 eggs; or 1 1/4 pounds poultry; 3/4 pound tinned vegetables; or 1 1/4 pounds fresh vegetables; or 3 gills beans or peas; or 1/2 pound rice or other cereal; 2 ounces coffee; or 2 ounces cocoa; or 1/2 ounce tea; 1 ounce evaporated milk; or 1-16 quart fresh milk; 3-16 pound dried fruit; or 3/8 pound tinned fruit; or 9-16 pound fresh fruit (one ration of fruit is allowed with each ration of beans, peas, rice and other starch foods and canned vegetables issued); 2 ounces butter; 4 ounces sugar; 7 pounds lard for every 100 pounds flour used as bread.

There is also this weekly ration:

1/4 pound cheese; 1/4 pound macaroni; 1-32 pound pepper; 1/4 pound pickles; 1-32 pound mustard; 1/4 pound salt; 1/2 pint sirup; 1-128 pound spices; 1/4 pound tomatoes (canned); 1/2 pint vinegar or oil; yeast, baking powder, and flavoring extracts as required.

In addition to the foregoing, the following issues are allowed to men of the engineer and dynamo force standing watch under steam between the hours of 8 P.M. and 8 A.M.: 4 ounces hard bread or its equivalent. 1 ounce coffee. 4 ounces tinned meat or its equivalent. 2 ounces sugar.

Also, during the continuance of the present war, the following extra allowance will be made to enlisted men of the deck force when standing watches between the hours of 8 P.M. and 8 A.M.: 1 ounce coffee or cocoa; 2 ounces sugar; 4 ounces hard bread or its equivalent; 4 ounces preserved meat or its equivalent.

There may be an overissue of any ration components provided there is an underissue of equal value of other components.

THE following naval order issued in 1914 and reaffirmed in July, 1917, is now more rigidly than ever adhered to:

"Because adequate and satisfactory subsistence is the very foundation not only of real efficiency but of discipline itself, there is no class of purchases for the naval service that needs to be more constantly watched than provisions—our men being no 'poison squad' but human beings and American citizens for whom we stand in the relation of trustee in so far as relates to the question of food. It is therefore directed that every effort to try on the navy any experiments or tests of any food product whatever shall be promptly suppressed. No provisions will under any circumstances be accepted if there be the least question as to purity or nutritive value—it being constantly borne in mind that doubtful food is bad food and will be treated as such."

These orders were promulgated in peace-time to keep the men contented and in the best possible physical condition against the time when the navy might be put to the test. That time is now at hand; and it becomes imperatively necessary that the greatest care be exercised by all concerned to the end that food procured for the navy shall comply in every particular with the very letter of the specifications as determined by rigid and inflexible inspection.

The Surgeon General of the Navy has repeatedly stated and the people of the United States confidently believe that the American Navy is the best fed body of men in the world.

Admiral McGowan keenly realizes that the only way to continue to deserve that confidence is to watch every ounce of food that is delivered and to unconditionally reject anything concerning which there could be the least possible question.

"DO you have any trouble with the big meat packers?"

"No," Admiral McGowan said, "and we couldn't have much trouble with them. They know our requirements, and they know too that our inspectors are right on the job to watch every step of their processes. We inspect all our beef before it is killed, while it is being dressed and packed and shipped, and when it is delivered. Nobody knows better than the packers that no bad beef can get by. Any packer who asks for less inspection gets more. The packers are not the bad sort they are sometimes represented. We have always found them very willing to work with us.

"The rationing of the navy is as carefully planned out as the buying," Admiral McGowan continued. "Our motto at mess is 'the full dinner pail, the clean plate and the empty garbage can.' Our men at mess can help themselves to all they want, but they must eat all they take. They must coordinate the eyes and the stomach. This is our part of food conservation. There is no cut in quality or quantity of the navy's food. We are asking the people at home to use other flours, than wheat, and they are cheerfully responding. Do you know really why this is required? It is not that the peoples of England and France may have wheat bread, but that every one of our fighting men at the front, both in the navy and army, may have all that he wants of the very best food. This is not only because he needs every possible degree of nourishment but also that he may be absolutely free of suspicion that any food experiments are being tried out on him. Don't doubt for a minute that even the humblest man in the United States navy is getting the best wheat bread in the world. And the best of everything else. Even in the pressure of war times, even in extremest emergency, the navy will not experiment at the expense of its sailors nor permit them to suspect experimentation. And for another thing the navy will not now or any time deal with irresponsible business concerns."

Admiral McGowan says things with the same broad comprehensiveness and the same snap with which he does them. "At this minute, I could tell you what every man in the navy, wherever he is, will have for his breakfast, his dinner and his supper today, and I know it is the best food the world can produce."

Admiral McGowan's spacious office, immaculately clean, is furnished only with his desk and his own chair. The walls are covered with portraits of the men who for seventy-five years have occupied this room, engaged in provisioning the navy and in directing the researches and developing the system that has met the present emergency without a jar. The Admiral has evidently observed that men who have important things to say can say them briefly and say them better standing. He stood himself. The few papers to which he referred, as department heads consulted him, were on his desk, not in it. "Not a desk in this department has a document in it," he explained. "Nothing gathers mold here. Food business must be fresh." Everything is in sight. There are no secrets regarding the food of the navy.

Six Million Army Uniforms and Hats

Fifty Coats Cut Out at a Time. Carpenter's Visit to the Factories—By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE come to Philadelphia to tell you how we are making clothes for the soldiers. I could have done equally well by going to New York, Chicago, Baltimore or Boston; and there are thousands of men and women upon the same job in Cincinnati, St. Louis, Cleveland, Louisville and Rochester. More or less army clothing is being made in the factories of some of the other cities, but the great bulk will be turned out in those I have mentioned. Here at Philadelphia I visited one establishment which manufactures 4,000 overcoats every day, as well as thousands of jackets and breeches. The plant has 2,000 men working on uniforms alone, and it turns out seven overcoats a minute all the working day through.

The most of the work is done by machinery and the machinery is of a highly specialized nature. It is the culmination of long lines of invention by which metal of various kinds has put on the aspects of life, and seems to think its way through the various processes. Imagine knives worked by electricity which will cut out fifty overcoats at a time, needles that will sew riding breeches so that they fit the leg as closely as those made by hand, and machines that will even sew on buttons by the thousands a day, giving each just so many threads, and fastening the ends so that the button will not come off. Think of machines that will put in eyelets and make buttonholes, that will insert sleeve linings and cut the trimmings to suit, and of electric instruments of one kind or other that will perform almost every operation needed to make the uniforms fit for our soldiers in the camp or the field.

BUT first let me give you some idea of the size of this big tailoring job. It is hard to realize the enormous demands made upon the government in connection with the forces we are sending to Europe. The amount of money estimated for quartermaster's supplies this year is just about two and one-fourth billion dollars, and the greater part of this will go for uniforms, shoes and similar supplies. It is estimated that Uncle Sam will pay $101 for the clothing of every soldier sent to France, and this in addition to his eating utensils and fighting equipment. Every soldier has to have an overcoat, the average cost of which is about $14. By the first of last January 6,000,000 such coats had already been contracted for and more than 2,000,000 delivered. The remainder is now being turned out at the rate of many thousands per day.

And then the uniforms! Every man has two suits as well as woolen shirts and underclothing for summer and winter. He has two pairs of shoes which cost Uncle Sam over $5 a pair; and he has hats, gloves and other furnishings which altogether make up the cost mentioned above. The task of making these things is enormous, and the workmen required to supply it are many.

The clothes made for the soldiers are manufactured mostly in factories. The business is different from that of ordinary ready-made clothing. The styles are fixed and the manufacturer has nothing to do with the selection of goods nor the prices of raw materials. The cloth is furnished by the government and shipped direct from the mills to the factories. That used for the uniforms comes in great bolts, fifty-four inches wide and from forty to sixty yards long, and the manufacturer is charged with every yard and he has to deliver or account for that much of the clothing.

The cutting is especially interesting. No scissors have ever been made which will cut more than one thickness of overcoat cloth at one time, and the long knives which were formerly moved up and down through a slot in the table had a capacity of only a dozen layers or so. The cutting is now done by electricity. The instrument used is a little dynamo connected with which is a knife eight or ten inches long. An electric light globe fastened to the machine over the knife throws the light on the drawing as the cutter moves the machine along through the goods. The knife goes through the fifty layers as though they were cheese, and the fifty patterns when taken out are exactly alike. The machine sharpens the knife as it goes, and it is so accurate that it does equally well in cutting a crescent which has the short curve of a watch case as in making the long line which measures the back of a coat. With this machine pieces for fifty overcoats can be cut out within a very few minutes.

Much of the cloth was woven at home, and this was so of both wool and cotton.

A little later still ready-made clothing began to be sold, but the garments were cut out by the manufacturers and sent out to the women folk of the towns and country about, who sewed on them at their leisure. Much of the work was done in winter-time. It was only the better grades of clothing that were sewed in the cities.

This condition continued until the Civil War broke out. Then the demand for uniforms was much like that we have now. There was no cloth to speak of and no soldiers' clothing. Some uniforms were brought in from Europe, and big orders were given to the home manufacturers. One man received an order amounting to $1,250,000, and other orders were equally large. It was impossible to have them filled from the homes of the workers, and factories were established and machinery of one kind or another began to be used. The sewing machine, which had been invented some years before, had been used in making clothes for the French army, and it now aided in making clothes for the Federal soldiers. The Army demands stimulated invention, and Singer and others took out patents for improvements toward the end of the war. These improvements have gone steadily on since then, so that now the machine has been adapted to almost everything that can be sewed. Up to 1895 our government had issued more than 7,000 patents for sewing machines and their parts.

When the Civil War was over there were hundreds of thousands of soldiers who went back to the business of every-day life. Their civilian clothing had worn out in the meantime, and when they gave up their uniforms they had to have another supply. This made a big demand for factory-made garments, and the ready-made stuff grew better and better.

IT took thirty-six million rabbits to make the hats now worn by the United States Army. Since the war began Uncle Sam has bought six million hats, and each contains the fur of six or eight rabbits. In other words, every soldier is going about with six bunnies on the top of his head.

The most of the hats for the Army are manufactured in about a dozen factories scattered here and there between the Atlantic Ocean and the Alleghany Mountains. They have practically given up their work for civilians in order to carry out the large Army contracts. They have kept abreast of the demands of the government, and so far we have had no shortage of hats, either here or in France.

The government contracts are on the basis of $1.75 per hat, and that notwithstanding hats of similar quality and make are selling in the retail stores all over the country from $3.50 to $4. As I figure it, the contractors are not making more than from $1 to $1.50 per dozen upon their work for the government. That means they are receiving a profit of from 8 to 12½ cents per hat. I doubt whether many of them make as much as 12 cents.

We are doing all we can to keep the orders down to the minimum; and, with that in view, establishments for the repair of Army hats will be made here at home and in France, where a great hat repair department has been started back of the lines. Expert hat-makers have been sent from this country to take charge of that plant. The old hats will be scoured and fitted out with new cords and ribbons. They will be reblocked, and when finished will look just like new.

Shrinking cloth for Army clothing, while cloth for civilians waits

The orders are so large and the necessity of speedy production so great, that almost everything is done by machinery. It is far different from the making of clothes for civilians. Their ready-made garments are of many different styles and much of the work on the better grade is by hand. The suit for the soldiers is expected to be worn without change, and it is issued in sizes, graded to the different physiques of the Army.

Indeed, the industry of making ready-made clothing was founded upon Army demands. The uniforms of the revolution were cut out and sewed up by hand in the homes of the people, and for long after that time the most of the clothing used by our people was made either by the women in the family or by custom tailors, who, in some cases, went from house to house.

THE Austrian offensive, of June 15, came to a halt on the following day. Under cover of smoke clouds which masked the river the Austrians succeeded in throwing across bridges at Nervesa and south of the Zenson Bend. Pressing westward from Nervesa they succeeded in taking nearly two-thirds of the Plateau of Montello, which if it had fallen completely into their hands would have enabled them to threaten seriously the entire Italian line along the Piave. Their crossing south of Fagare, along the southern reaches of the Piave, was a most serious threat against the other flank of the Italians, and the two crossings offered a promising beginning of the usual pincer tactics, which have proven effective in so many fields since the war began. But a pincer to be effective must pinch, and the Italian counter-attacks effectively prevented the pinching. For four days the Austrians, though fighting desperately, were able to make only slight progress on Montello, while west of the lower Piave they crossed in some places the Fossalta Canal, although this progress was more of a temporary advance of a swaying line than a real conquest.

During these four days the fighting had been most sanguinary, the Austrian losses in killed and wounded being estimated by Allied military experts in excess of 150,000 men, while the Italians, and their French and British Allies, had taken nearly 10,000 prisoners. In the furious fighting of the 19th the Italians definitely stopped the Austrians, whom they had backed up against the Piave, with their bridges under constant bombardment from the air, and their massed troops crowded into unfavorable ground under a sweeping and murderous fire from the artillery, while their forward positions were under constant attack.

The Piave on the 19th allied itself with the brave defender of Venetia, and rushing into flood as a result of rains in the mountains, carried away twelve of fourteen bridges connecting the Montello positions with the eastern shore. The Austrians made desperate attempts to restore the bridges, but the Italian airmen, who with British, French and Americans aiding, had gained complete mastery of the air, prevented any reconstruction, leaving the troops on the western shore to fight as best they could with the material in their hands. On the 20th the Italians forced the Austrians back on the Montello, retaking a considerable area of the Plateau, and 1,226 prisoners. It was estimated that some 50,000 Austrian troops were penned in this area. On the southern flank of the line from Fossalta to the sea the Austrians were also driven back and prisoners were taken, there even being a report that the Italians had succeeded in driving a wedge to the river, separating the Austrian armies into two groups. French forces, on June 20, stormed Austrian positions on the Asiago Plateau and Italian troops captured Costalunga.

On June 21 the Austrians attacked again with fresh forces on the Montello and below Zenson. On the Montello they succeeded in regaining some of the ground taken by the Italians on the 20th, but later lost most of their gains including Nervesa, being in possession of only about one-third of the plateau and under constant pressure. In the south the desperate attacks of the Austrians were futile against the determination of the Italians, and the Austrian held ground was narrowed, the Italians taking Capo Sile, a little to the north of the mouth of the Piave, which was about choked with flotsam of the battle.

A Week in the World's News

WILL AUSTRIA CRUMBLE? Whether or not the dual-monarchy is in a state of imminent rupture, it is at least known that it is facing serious times. There is considerable evidence that the Austrian drive on the Italians was a desperate measure taken to bolster up the courage of a people growing restive under starvation. That the drive was prompted by hunger was quite evident from Austrian orders captured, in which the soldiers were reminded of the great booty of food and wines taken last fall and were promised the food that lay behind the Italian lines. It has become necessary for Austria to reduce the bread ration to 1½ pounds per person per week in spite of protests from labor unions, from the press and from heads of government departments. Attempts to secure dried vegetables, potatoes and other substitutes for bread were futile. Appeals to Germany and Hungary brought slight relief, both countries being unable out of their own stores to spare sufficient to relieve Austrian anxiety. The Rumanian stores had been overestimated and the stores in the Ukraine had also been exaggerated and were in the hands of an unfriendly people who buried and burned their grain rather than sell it to their former enemies.

On June 19 rioting broke out in Vienna. The mobs broke into bakeries and stoned the residences of the Premier and the King, and it was necessary to rush cavalry to the capital to restore order. More than 100,000 workmen in arsenals and airplane factories went on strike and disorder was spreading.

Vienna, on June 21, to submit to Emperor Charles the resignation of his cabinet, forced from power by the food situation and by an attempt, because of Parliament opposition, to govern without the Parliament.

AMERICANS STRIKE AGAIN. American troops at Cantigny, on June 20, stormed and captured German trench and machine gun nests east of Cantigny; a few prisoners were taken. The prisoners said that they had been ordered to hold the position at all costs.

NEITHER HOME RULE NOR CONSCRIPTION. Earl Curzon, speaking in Parliament on June 20, said that the discovery of the Sinn Fein plot and the action of the Irish Roman Catholic Clergy in advising people under penalty of eternal damnation to resist conscription, had so altered the situation that it would be folly for the government to proceed with Home Rule, and that as to conscription it would be necessary for the government to recognize the facts and adjust the policy to them.

PENNY IN ZEEBRUGGE. British airmen reported, on June 19, that twenty-one German destroyers, a large number of submarines, and many auxiliary craft were penned in the Bruges Canal Docks, as a result of the blocking of the channel by the British raid. They reported also that the Germans were working day and night to clear the passage, but that each night British bombing planes demolished the work.

A BIGGER NAVY. The House, on June 18, accepted the Senate amendment to the Annual Naval Appropriations Bill, increasing the permanent strength of the Navy from 87,000 to 131,485, and increasing the number of officers from 3,700 to 5,500. An officer of an American passenger steamer, which made port, on June 18, reported having passed an American submarine flotilla at sea, from which he received the information that an American submarine had a few days previously torpedoed a German submarine, off the coast. The Navy Department has not confirmed the report.

AMERICANS TO ITALY. Washington having given its consent, it was announced, on June 19, that American troops would be sent to Italy, the number to be determined by Gen. Foch, while the units to be sent would be designated by Gen. Pershing. American aviators were the first unit of American troops to proceed to the Italian front, signaling their arrival by destroying an Austrian bridge.

RHEIMS A SOLID ROCK. Three divisions, some 40,000 German shock troops, on the night of June 18, at 9 o'clock, following a three-hour bombardment of smoke and explosive shells, attempted to take from the French the city of Rheims, which since the Aisne offensive has constituted a semi-circular salient, projecting into the German positions. The attack was most intense upon the right and left wings of the semi-circular front, although the whole fourteen miles was under pressure. On the western side, between Vignay and Ormes, German storming troops were mowed down, and were unable to reach the French lines, although the attempts were repeated many times. On the eastern flank, in the neighborhood of Fort Pompelle, the Germans penetrated slightly into the woods about the Fort, but were thrown back by French counter-attacks. When the attacks ceased not a foot of ground had been gained. Prisoners declared that the three divisions had been ordered to take the Cathedral City at all costs.

BACK IN THE SERVICE. From January, 1915, to the end of May, 1918, the British had raised and repaired 407 ships sunk by mines and submarines.

GAS FOR GAS. The Germans, defeated by the Americans at Belleau, and driven almost completely from the woods south of the town, retaliated by sending over about 5,000 gas shells in forty-eight hours. On Saturday and Sunday, June 15 and 16, the American artillery repaid them by sending over 7,000 shells to the Germans (5,000). The American troops withstood this intense bombardment of gas like veterans, although they are drafted men, who had only recently completed their final training, and were for the first time bearing the whole responsibility of defense of the front line. On June 20 American troops attacked a small salient still held by the Germans on the north side of Belleau Wood. The Germans retired before the American artillery barrage and our men advanced their lines five-eighths of a mile without fighting. The American positions were further improved, on June 21, by a series of brilliant attacks made without artillery preparation.

On the night of June 18 two American patrols crossed the Marne, penetrated German positions, engaged German troops, inflicted casualties and returned with prisoners. An attempt of the Germans to cross to the American side was discovered and defeated by artillery fire. Americans northwest of Toul on June 18, made their first attack on the Germans with gas projectors.

It was officially announced on June 21

THE MOVABLE BOUNDARY. The German troops operating in southern Russia, having penetrated somewhat beyond the borders originally assigned to the Ukraine, the German commander was reported, on June 18, to have proposed a new boundary line to the Russian commander. The Germans were still advancing eastward toward the Urals. On June 5th about 300,000 German and Austrian troops were occupying Russian territory; most of them were south of a line beginning on the Gulf of Finland at Narva in Estonia, 90 miles west of Petrograd, and running through Pskov, Orsha, Kursk, Valuiki, Novo-Teherkask and Rostov on the Don. There were some 50,000 to 100,000 German troops in Finland. The Czechoslovaks in Siberia were reported, on June 6, to have stopped all traffic on the Volga River. The Germans were reported to be greatly worried by the anti-Bolshevist activities of the Cossacks, and the threat of Allied intervention in Russia.

The Far Eastern Russian Committee for the Salvation of the Mother Country, on June 19, sent an appeal through Japan for immediate intervention in Siberia by Entente forces. Speaking in the U. S. Senate, on June 19, Senator Fall of New Mexico, Senator Lewis of Illinois and Senator Kenyon of Iowa, plead for action in support of the Siberians and Czechoslovaks in Russia. Dispatches of June 19 by way of Moscow told of a great revolt in Kiev, 40,000 peasants armed and organized, demanding the withdrawal of the German commander, Von Eichhorn and Ambassador Schwartzstein. German attempts to force by military authority the sowing of grain were reported to have failed completely.

TRENCH FEVER. A new American achievement in medical research was officially announced, on June 17, by Secretary Baker, who transmitted a telegram from Gen. Pershing, reporting the success of an experiment in which 66 American soldiers, for the sake of science and the Army, submitted to inoculation with the germs of trench fever. American medical men had suspected the trench louse, familiarly known as the "cootie." The case against the "cootie" was proven, and steps are being taken to neutralize or eliminate him. American troops coming from the trenches are now given hot baths, while their clothes are sterilized.

THE SUNDRY CIVIL BILL. The House, on June 17, passed the Sundry Civil Appropriation Bill, carrying appropriations totaling $2,915,000,000. $1,761,000,701 was appropriated for the Shipping Board, $50,000,000 was placed at the disposal of the President to use as he sees fit, $1,250,000 was appropriated for the Committee on Public Information, $7,500,000 for the Food Administration, $3,500,000 for the Fuel Administration, and a like sum for the War Trade Board. $2,800,000 was appropriated for the Department of Labor and $1,450,000 for the War Industries Board.

TURKS INVADE PERSIA. Turkish troops, on June 14, were reported to have occupied both shores of Lake Urumiah and the city of Tabriz, the second largest in Persia, the action being taken to protect the wing of their army operating in the Russian Caucasus which had advanced from Batum to a point a few miles east of Alexandropol.

A message from American Minister Caldwell at Teheran, received in Washington on June 19, reported the destruction by the Turks of the American Consulate in Tabriz and of the Colton Memorial Hospital, conducted in Tabriz by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. The Consul and staff and the hospital staff had left Tabriz, and were not thought to have been injured, but the destruction of American property, if substantiated by later reports, was looked upon in Washington as a possible prelude to active war between Turkey and the United States. Diplomatic relations between the two countries were suspended April 20, 1917.

RAIDING PROFITEERS. On June 17 Government Agents raided the offices of contractors in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and a number of other cities in which large contracts are being filled for the Government, the object being to uncover evidence of profiteering, especially on the part of men fraudulently collecting commissions for influencing Government purchases. A number of indictments were returned on the 17th. On the 18th a First Lieutenant representing the Quartermaster's Department, in New York, was arrested and confessed to accepting bribes from contractors. It was expected that the operations of a large number of men, some of whom were said to be secretaries to Congressmen, would be uncovered by the correspondence seized in the various offices, and the Government was reported to be determined to rout out fraud and profiteering.

On June 19 four men were arrested in Washington charged with conspiracy to defraud the Government by securing the second payment of bills. The conspirators were caught before any Government money had been secured, but the discovery of their plan of operation resulted in a much more careful auditing of bills by all departments of the Government. The correspondence secured in the raids showed that one firm of manufacturers' agents in Washington had received $100,000 in commissions on Government contracts, while another firm when raided was about to close 15 contracts.

WESTERN UNION REJECTS PRESIDENT'S PLEA. President Carlton of the Western Union Telegraph Company, on June 18, in a letter to President Wilson, declined to abide by the decision of the National War Labor Board, as requested by the President. Mr. Carlton declared that the Union, while agreeing not to strike during the war, would use the intervening time to prepare for a strike as soon as peace came.

SOUTH AMERICAN FORCES TO TRAIN HERE. Congress was asked, on June 18, for an appropriation to provide training facilities in this country for forces other than American troops. It was understood that the request referred to Cuban and Brazilian troops, who will be trained in this country before serving in France, Brazil especially being able to furnish several army corps.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. It was announced, on June 18, that strenuous efforts were being made to launch 70 ships on July 4th, but that the number would not be less than 55. . . . The Panama Canal Zone has been made bone dry by a military order. . . . The reclassification of men under the recent order of Gen. Crowder was reported, on June 19, to have added 250,000 men to Class I. . . . The Shipping Board, on June 19, in a hearing before the Senate Agricultural Committee, opposed the bone dry amendment to the Emergency Food Bill, asserting that war time prohibition of beer and light wines would result in intense dissatisfaction and probably reduce ship output by 25%. . . . M. Malanoff was requested by King Ferdinand of Bulgaria on June 19 to form a Cabinet to succeed Radoslavoff's Cabinet, which resigned early in June. Malanoff has been known as a foe of King Ferdinand's War policy, and his call to power was looked upon as an evidence of the centrifugal forces tending to rend apart the alliance with Germany. . . . It was officially announced in London on June 20 that, since January 1, the Allies had destroyed 835 German airplanes. . . . The Y. W. C. A. will combine a campaign for $15,000,000 with the campaign for $100,000,000 to be made by the Y. M. C. A.

Conflicting Ideals

IN these heart-searching days, the souls of the nations are being laid bare to the gaze of the world. Such revelations usually come to us when least expected. At times they are merely fleeting introversive glimpses, but there are rare occasions when we are privileged to look more deeply and to distinguish with a certain definiteness the ideals that dominate the nations, molding all of their hopes and expectations from the great war.

Three of the ablest minds in America today—Presidents Hadley of Yale, Lowell of Harvard, and Hibben of Princeton—in their baccalaureate addresses have pointed out that America's Christian ideal is the real hope—the bright arch of promise—that overhangs the world situation. Only now has the soul of the nation been awakened into life. Pushing all selfish interests aside, we willingly face hardships and sacrifices in upholding this ideal, which involves all that relates to the honor, justice, truthfulness, sympathy and helpfulness of the American nation, and the responsibility of doing our share toward making the world better. Faith in the future, an abiding conviction in our duty as a nation to do our full part toward restoring and maintaining moral order and re-establishing law in the world; that love of liberty which is our inheritance, now kindled into a consuming passion—these are the high objectives that have taken possession of us, urging us on in the struggle and nerving us with perfect confidence in the outcome. The cause is sacred, and we shall count nothing lost to secure its attainment, for—

"When wealth is lost, nothing is lost;
When character is lost, all is lost."

We have by way of contrast the ideal of the German militarists, as set forth by their best authority—the Kaiser himself. Responding to Chancellor von Hertling's felicitations on the thirtieth anniversary of his reign, the Emperor telegraphed his thanks and recalled "with special gratitude" the circumstance that when he celebrated his twenty-fifth year jubilee as ruler, he could point out that "I had been able to do my work as a prince of peace." Overlooking the fact, proved by the undisputed record of history, that under his "peaceful" rule he had ceaselessly prepared for war, he proceeds: "For nearly four years, forced to it by our enemies, we have been engaged in the hardest struggle history records. God the Lord has laid a heavy burden upon my shoulders, but I carry it in the consciousness of our good right, with confidence in our ships, our sword, and our strength, and in the realization that I have the good fortune to stand at the head of the most capable people on earth. . . . I know that Prussian militarism, so much abused by our enemies, which my forefathers and I . . . have nurtured, has given Germany's sword and German national strength to triumph, and the victory will bring a peace which will guarantee the German life."

All for Germany, for its ultimate triumph and its happy future! Beyond these, the vision of this "prince of peace" cannot penetrate.

But the Kaiser has been even more explicit in his depiction of the German ideal, which he set forth in a characteristic address at his anniversary celebration at main headquarters. He spoke of the war as one in which "either German principles of right, freedom, honor and morality must be upheld, or Anglo-Saxon principles, with their idolatry of mammon, must be victorious." The Anglo-Saxons, he declared, aim at making the people of the world "work as slaves of that ruling race." This colossal misconception of a situation, the real facts of which the whole world already knows, is like many others that proceed from the same source—a mere utterance for home consumption in Germany. It is in line with the policy, long followed, of misrepresenting the Allies and their aims—a policy so transparent that intelligent Germans perfectly well understand its purpose. In interpreting the war as a death-struggle between the Teutonic and Anglo-Saxon races, Kaiser Wilhelm may well be suspected of "playing to the galleries," not only in Germany but in Austria. To give to the conflict this aspect now cannot be regarded as other than an effort to kindle the fires of racial hatred at a time when both the Teutonic countries are sick of the slaughter, and asking: "Haven't they reached Paris yet?"

The Blessedness of Giving

OUR country has for many years grown rich in material prosperity. Those envious of our financial success have styled us "money-getters" and "money-lovers." Without riches there could be no giving. Consecrated wealth, therefore, like talents of mind, body and soul, contribute to the happiness and development of mankind.

Receiving and giving are like an endless circle, coming in and going out, blessing everywhere in its flow. It is like the nerves of sensation, receiving wonders from the outer world, and nerves of motion, reciprocating by sending forth thoughts, feelings, physical powers and affections. If the outer flow is intercepted by covetousness, the soul becomes a Dead Sea where no living thing survives.

God never hoards. He gives worlds of beauty, lives of joy, hearts of love, angels of mercy, mansions of splendor, while immortality is the golden circle on which these pearls are strung. Our Father's child of nature is a great giver. Behold the grandeur of her mountains, the majesty of her oceans, the sublimity of her storms, the beauty of her sunsets, flowers and forests! She gives her strength to the seed for the harvest, her sun and air for the growth of the blade. She gives her fruits and the gems of her bosom to whomsoever will. Man is the only being who seeks to break the infinite law. He becomes a monstrosity by hoarding for self, by hating instead of loving, and by getting rather than giving.

Every soul is poor till it gives itself away. Abraham never fully possessed his son Isaac till he had given him up to God. Is it not so with millions today who are giving their hearts' blood to redeem human liberty from horrible oppression? Will not their souls and their sons be far more precious and noble after the victory, and if we have to go to the heavenly mansions to find them, will not that meeting be indescribably blessed? Has not our own manhood grown taller, purer and richer by our surrender? Is not God's Providence bringing the angels out of the marble of our hearts?

The earth once gave her darkness up when God said, "Let there be light." Our giving is only opening our windows wider toward the heavenly radiance. Giving transforms the giver and the receiver; withholding makes man a blot on God's book of life.

Across the Years

TO us, on this Fourth of July, there comes a sound of tramping feet as our soldier boys, splendid in the glow of their valor and youth, march off to do their part in the great war. Across a span of years that counts more than a century, our listening ears on this day may bring to us an echo of the same steady tread. We know that we are hearing the phantom footfalls of the Minute Men who, leaving their little farms, seized their arms and sprang to the defense of their liberty—the brave men who gave their blood at Concord and Lexington in behalf of union and truth and justice, and who died that a nation might be born.

Today our boys are marching away heroically as their forebears marched. They have heard the wordless call of the Minute Men and they have answered it. But we who stay at home, have we heard the call that comes ringing across the years—the call of the Minute Men, which tells us that war is still hardship and sacrifice, and that we must give, and give gladly of those things that we hold most dear! Have we heard the call that comes to warn us that the nation they founded is in danger—that we must rise, as valiantly as they rose, to defend it?

We who admire and love their sturdy memories should be prepared to leave our own everyday tasks at the call to maintain and defend the heritage they left us! Every one must in this day be a Minute Man, ready at any time for any task.

Through the mist of more than a hundred years we see them—the brave figures who fought and fell and rose again to fight on. And across the chasm that separates that far-off yesterday from the present, their powder-stained fingers point the way for us to follow. They blaze a trail. Along that trail some of us march away to war, while others remain to work at more prosaic but very necessary tasks. We are following that trail—we must follow it; for there is work for all to do!

The Colonel's Practical Sermon

THERE are occasional happy gleams of returning common sense in the utterances of Colonel Roosevelt lately. He has been pounding and hammering at so lively a rate, that it is quite a refreshing change to have him make such a deliverance as he did on a recent Sunday to an audience of five thousand, under the campus elms of Trinity College,

Hartford, at the commencement services. Taking for his text the advice of Israel's king to Benhadad, "Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off," he inveighed against "grandiloquent statements" about what we are going to do in the war. "Words," he held, "should be translated into deeds before they were spoken." He instanced the boast that America would have 20,000 airplanes with our army in France this spring, which he asserted had stimulated Germany to build planes in abundance, while our product has not yet materialized. As the lesson to be drawn from this experience, Colonel Roosevelt urged:

"Let's quit boasting; let's not humiliate the men in the trenches. We have every right to lift our own heads higher because of the valor of the men under Pershing. If we had not gone into this war, no self-respecting American would have been able to look a foreigner in the face. Our duty has only begun. Let us get away from empty and complacent self-congratulations."

The Colonel, who does nothing by halves when he is about it, also paid his respects in unmeasured terms to the profiteers, the pacifists, the I. W. W., the Bolsheviks, and the sentimentalists. He favored deporting disloyal non-alien as well as alien anarchists. His peroration was a peach. "I wish," he said, "a peace given by us on our own terms to a Germany beaten to her knees. I would not negotiate peace with Germany, but with Belgium, Serbia, Rumania, France and England. . . . Since March we have been putting over hundreds of thousands of men with resulting vacancies in the camps. We should have figured on 5,000,000—10,000,000, if necessary. Make it a minimum limit and make it now. Make it not less than 5,000,000, and start doing the work. Make the Gettysburg speech after the battle of Gettysburg, and not before."

The Colonel is the one American privileged to talk right out in meeting. There are a good many points in his suggestions that merit consideration in the proper quarter, not the least of them being his advice that the censor might occasionally be kept profitably busy in eliminating fool utterances of voice or pen, and relegating them to the limbo of things that are better left unsaid.

What Is the Retiring Age?

UNDER normal conditions, at what age does a man, trained to special pursuits and who has already demonstrated high ability and efficiency in the public service, reach the retiring age? This question, which affects many who stand foremost in public life today, is discussed by the Southern Medical Journal of Birmingham, Alabama, in its current issue. A case in point is that of Surgeon-General Gorgas, who will reach his sixty-fourth year a few months hence, which is the officially designated "retiring age" in the army. The work he has already accomplished is little short of marvelous. His successful battle with malaria and other tropical diseases, the life-saving that has unquestionably been accomplished under his skilful direction, "the health and happiness he has brought to millions" by his achievements in sanitation, his great health campaign among the miners of South Africa, and more recently the magnificent work he has done in training a great and efficient army of doctors, nurses, and hospital attendants to care for our sick and wounded soldiers at home and abroad, all point to him as one whose usefulness cannot be gauged by the calendar. Such men are ripe in the sixties and seventies.

In many walks of life, we may see notable instances of the full-round type of man, who should not be subjected to the arbitrary rule of a definite retiring age. We see them in finance, in law, in statesmanship, in the ministry, in authorship, in art and music, in invention and in various mercantile pursuits. They are living familiar illustrations of the fact that, with mind and body sound and faculties unimpaired, the last years can be the best—the years ripest in judgment and experience, and with the fullest endowment of wisdom and discretion. To summarily terminate the public usefulness of such men when they are best fitted for counsel and direction would deprive the nation of its ablest guides, and terminate careers which are still capable of winning triumphs under conditions that can yield only to the highest efficiency.

The "retiring age" is no doubt a convenient thing to make way for the young and ambitious, but in special cases it might very well be set aside, so that the nation should not be the loser by the retirement.

THE BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

Physicians for "Dry" Nation

THE annual convention of the American Medical Association at its opening session at the Auditorium in Chicago recently enthusiastically cheered the remarks of Dr. Arthur Bevan, as he pleaded for nation-wide prohibition. Among other things he said: "Each member of the medical profession should take an active part in the propaganda against drink and secure national prohibition; not years from now, but now, when it is so badly needed and will accomplish so much good, not only for our boys in khaki and in blue, but for the nation in arms. And when it has once been done away with, it could no more be resurrected, after the war, than could slavery. There can be no doubt of the injurious effects of alcoholic drinks on both the physical and mental well-being of our population. There can be no doubt that the greatest single factor we can control in the interest of the public health of the nation would be the elimination of alcoholic drink. I want to plead for the united action of the organized medical profession of the country, to secure protection by law against the injury that drink is doing our people, not as a political measure, but as the most important public health measure that could be secured. In this crisis, when we and our Allies are fighting not only for ourselves, but also for humanity and civilization, we must organize the entire nation in the most efficient way possible, and this cannot be done without eliminating drink." The medical profession used very generally to recommend the moderate use of intoxicants as beneficial to health. The change of opinion, as expressed by the Medical Association Convention in Chicago, compelled by science, has done much to hasten nation-wide prohibition. The war prohibition Dr. Bevan demands is likely to be accomplished in three months, which would take the life out of the liquor traffic and make the ratification of the constitutional prohibitory resolution possible within a year from now. The physical and moral evils of strong drink are thus described: "Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine." (Prov. 23: 29, 30.)

Recommend Porpoise for Food

THE food authorities of Texas have been taking great pains to demonstrate the value of the porpoise for table purposes in America. They have shown that each animal furnishes about 200 pounds of boneless meat which looks like venison but tastes like veal; that it yields much oil, and furnishes an excellent quality of leather. The name porpoise is from the Latin porcus, "hog," and piscois, "fish," a fish hog. So it is, for it has from forty to fifty teeth in each jaw, which enable it to catch vast quantities of herring, mackerel, salmon, etc. It follows the schools of fish up and into the bays and estuaries, and even up rivers, as far as the salt continues. In olden times the porpoise was very highly prized as an article of food, much used by royalty. In the time of Queen Elizabeth the nobility of England counted it a luxury. As the porpoise sports in so many places off the coasts of the Atlantic and Pacific, from Maine around to they shall be an abomination unto you." (Lev. 11: 10.)

Purcell Robbed of $125,000

AFTER being captured by Chinese bandits, robbed of a fortune, and hauled through the interior of China in a cage in which he was exhibited to the natives like a wild animal, E. J. Purcell, an American railway engineer, made his escape recently and started from Peking to New York. He was accompanied by citizen seems to furnish cause for a demand on China for an explanation. For thousands of years the people of China have been proverbially honest. Their law is so strict against theft that it cuts off a man's head for that crime. But all nations in all times have had their lawless bands, their highway robbers. Christ thus refers to them in one of his parables: "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead." (Luke 10: 30.)

Woman's College in Japan

AN advance in the higher education for women in Japan has been made in the recent dedication of the Woman's Christian College in Japan. Through the co-operation of six mission boards, one Canadian and five American, this institution has been established in the suburbs of Tokyo. In the opening ceremonies was a large gathering of Japanese, showing the interest they are taking in the new movement. The American ambassador, Roland S. Morris, was among the speakers. The University has eighty-four students enrolled in the first class. The war has interfered with the raising of funds, but the friends of the college say that within three years it will have a campus of fifteen or twenty acres, and new buildings as a necessary equipment for the large work laid out for it. The world does move. Japan, so rapidly appropriating the civilization of the West, is opening the doorway of progress for women. Christ is bringing light, liberty and love to the heathen women of the world. The Woman's College, which is Christ's College in Japan, aims at the female culture thus mentioned: "That our daughters may be as corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace." (Ps. 144: 12.)

Six Months for Loafing

A MAN from Providence, Rhode Island, was arrested at Baldwinsville, a suburb of Syracuse, New York, the other day and convicted of the crime of loafing, according to a law passed at the recent session of the legislature. Justice B. C. Meays, after lecturing him on his lack of patriotism by idling when industries and farmers all over the country were crying for help, sentenced him to six months' hard labor in the county penitentiary, the limit of the law. The man had been in the village for three weeks, during which time he did not do a stroke of work. He fished in the daytime and slept in the woods, it is said, at night. At this time, when the life of the nation is at stake, the state does wisely to count the idleness of the able-bodied a crime, and to impose the penalty. There is a law which is at the basis of individual health and thrift, and of national prosperity and happiness. It is this: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." (Gen. 3: 19.)

Making Bread in Jerusalem

THE British soldiers are making and baking bread in the city of Jerusalem out of the same materials and in the same manner as the people of Palestine did when the Holy City was founded, or when our Lord walked its streets. The grain out of which the best quality was made was wheat; barley was only used by the poor or in time of famine, and rye was not raised to any extent in the East. The earliest method of preparing the grain was to soften it with water, subject it to pressure, then grind it between two stones or in a mortar, and bake in thin cakes in the sun, or in a primitive oven. Then a kneading-trough or a wooden bowl was used and the bread worked usually by the hands of the women. Leaven being discovered, it was used to raise the dough, and make it lighter. The cakes were cooked in primitive times on heated stones, and turned while baking. Then the average domestic oven was used as in the time of Christ. It was a stone or metal jar about three feet high which was heated inwardly or outwardly with wood, dried grass stalks or vegetables, etc. Some of the ovens were holes dug in the ground, with sides plastered with clay and the floor made of gravel. In imitation of these ovens in the earth are the ones now being used by the British soldiers in Jerusalem. They are a row of semi-circular stone ovens covered with earth. These ovens are heated, then the fire is drawn, and the bread baked in them. The bread was, however, raised and prepared for baking by the heat of the sun. From an early time there were public ovens, and professional bakers furnished the community with bread. This baking business became so extensive in Jerusalem that there was one whole street called "Bakers' Street." There is this reference to it: "Then Zedekiah the king commanded that they should commit Jeremiah into the court of the prison, and that they should give him daily a piece of bread out of the bakers' street, until all the bread in the city were spent. Thus Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison." (Jer. 37: 21.)

Alaska, it seems one of the most important and practical food suggestions yet made to meet the war exigencies of the nation. As the dolphin was sacred to Apollo and was invested with kindly and miraculous attributes, such as drawing the car of Amphitrite, and carrying Arion on its willing back, so now the porpoise, which belongs to the dolphin family, may be put to the benevolent and patriotic service of drawing the chariot of Mars, in increasing the man power of the nation and winning the war. Any Jews in this country who retain their obedience to the old Mosaic law would not be allowed to eat porpoise meat, according to the following restriction: "And all that have not fins and scales in the seas, and in the rivers, of all that move in the waters, and of any living thing which is in the waters, his wife and three children, who were in the Chinese capital during his imprisonment. The engineer said that he and G. A. Kyle, also an American engineer, left the village of Yen Chang in the province of Honan, China, on March 2 on a surveying trip. They took with them a number of Chinese assistants, twenty soldiers, and carried seven large boxes of American currency, amounting to $125,000. On the fourth day out they were overpowered by bandits, who took all their money, put Purcell in a cage, and transported him 200 miles into the mountains, subjecting him to all manner of humiliation and hardship. He managed to bribe the guard and make his escape to Peking. Another band of bandits carried Kyle away captive, but he was rescued by Chinese soldiers. Such treatment of an American

THE PERILS OF POWER

By
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT—Isa. 10: 13. "By the strength of my hand I have done it."

THESE words express the attitude and disposition of a proud and victorious nation. The Assyrian was stretching out his power, and subduing the nations like an overflowing sea. Opposition melted away before him like sand-castles before the advancing tide. Country after country was annexed; nation after nation was subdued. "He gathered the riches of the people as one gathers eggs from the nest, and there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped."

On every side of his triumphant march, peoples yielded tribute and bowed before his might. He was possessed by the lust of empire. He became intoxicated with power. His heart was inflated. His head was turned. His sense of power filled him with a sense of independence, and he apportioned to himself a glory which belonged alone to God. His power had been given him by God to accomplish God's will. But the consciousness of power had unbalanced him, and instead of regarding himself as secondary—as only a medium—he now regarded himself as a primary cause. "By the strength of my hand I have done it."

NOW, I think this declension has been illustrated in the history of nations a thousand times. Empire begets arrogance. Success is apt to breed atheism. Prosperity makes us godless. It has been very generally the case that a nation's prayerfulness has waned in proportion as its prosperity has increased. It was even so with the Puritans. While they were oppressed and persecuted they prayed, and consciously experienced the near presence and helpfulness of Almighty God. But when they gained ascendancy, when they tasted power, power intoxicated them, and they little by little lost their strong sense of dependence upon the strength and grace of God.

It is the commonplace of history that as a nation grows in consciousness of power, its conscious relationship to God is relaxed. The most critical time for any nation is when its sense of power destroys its sense of need. But how prone we are to forget that. Even as a church, how obscurely we recognize that fact that the severest testing-time for a nation is not in its depression, but in its prosperity; not in the consciousness of need, but in the consciousness of independence.

I turn to our hymn-book, where I find our prayers in song, and how few prayers are there for a nation that is strong, prosperous, and reveling in the luxury of power! I find prayers for peace, for victory, for the removal of pestilence, for rain, for fair weather—prayers for times of want and distress, but few or none for times of joy and plenty! One would think, even from our hymn-book, that we only need to sing for our nation when she is in dire straits, that when she emerges from the straits into a large and liberal state, prayer can then be laid aside as an implement that has accomplished its work. Why, it is just then that we ought to pray and sing the more! The deadly fungus is often the child of the richest soil. It is when a nation's commerce is healthy, when the harvest is plentiful, when Nature's comforts are freely distributed, when she grows from strength to strength, buoyant in the light and warmth of prosperity—it is then that there begins "the destruction that wasteth at noonday."

BUT this practical atheism is as characteristic of individual as it is of national life. Whatever creates in me a sense of power, tends to make me atheistic. I say that is the tendency. The tendency is often resisted, and successfully resisted; but the inclination created by a sense of power is invariably toward an independence which shuts out the thought of God. How is it? It is thus: When I become conscious of the possession of any power I begin to think of myself as a cause rather than as an effect. I find that I can originate enterprises, I can create enthusiasm, I can stir human hearts, I can win public applause, I can move my fellow men. Recognizing myself as a power I begin to think of myself as a creator, a cause, and, ignoring all the other causes, I lapse into an atheism which leaves out God. I am a King's ambassador, but I come to regard myself as the king.

NOW, St. Paul, in the Epistle to the Corinthians, mentions three things which create in men a sense of power, power which may intoxicate them, and which may alienate them from their God. He says that eloquence can do it, and learning can do it, and wealth can do it. All these three are endowments or possessions which are accompanied by power. How do they tend to make the practical atheists? Perhaps I had better define what I mean by a practical atheist. By a practical atheist I mean a man who thinks of himself primarily, and secondarily of his God, or who thinks only of himself and not at all of his God. Self, self first! God last!

Now, do these endowments I have named tend to inflate the self, the ego in man? How is it with eloquence? Eloquence gives a man a mighty power. But the eloquence which humbles the hearer can make the speaker proud. While the Assyrian subdued the nations, his own heart increased in pride. And while a speaker conquers an assembly for God, his own soul may be rebellious against the God he professes to serve. While his power is being manifest his heart may treacherously be saying, "By the strength of my hand I have done it!"

AND how is it with learning? It has become a proverbial phrase that "knowledge is power." It seems as though knowledge should fill men with a profound humility, with a solemn reverence and awe. He who knows most should be best aware how little is known, and out of that consciousness should be born a simplicity sweet as the simplicity of a little child. Let it be gratefully recognized that in thousands of instances knowledge has wrought this beautiful spirit. "The bird that soars on highest wing" has "built on the ground her lowly nest." Again and again has it happened that knowledge has made men kneel in hushed and solemn prayer. Wise men have brought their treasures and bowed low in worship before the Child of Bethlehem. And yet Paul says, "Knowledge puffeth up." It inflates men. It fills men with pride. It magnifies self until they cannot see God. That is the perilous tendency of knowledge if not wisely regarded as the gift of God.

Paul was a learned man, yea, among the foremost; and yet he was humble as a little child.

How was it? He ever regarded his knowledge as a trust. He regarded himself as a trader, trading on graciously entrusted capital. "I am a debtor to the unwise," he said, as though he had said, "My God has endowed me with the treasure of knowledge. I am his representative, girded with his power. Whenever my fellows are unwise, I am to regard myself as in their debt, and with my God's treasure I am to supply their lack." That is the course which keeps us humble; to regard knowledge as entrusted to us to make the unwise wise, to recognize that we have nothing which we have not received, and that wherein we differ from another is only in this, that God is just making us a channel for the distribution of his wealth. If that thought be obscured, the knowledge will operate upon us like victory upon the Assyrian of old; it will puff us up in thoughtless pride, and in the exercise of our power will cause us to say, "By the strength of my hand I have done it!"

THUS is it with the endowment of eloquence. So it is with the endowment of knowledge.

Is it otherwise with the endowment of wealth? Money is power. It gives you a key to society. It makes you a local magnate. It opens the door of Parliament. He who has money has a consciousness of power. But does it not tend to make men atheistic? "How hard for them that have riches to enter into the Kingdom of God." But a little later, the Master amplified his word and said, "How hard for them that trust in riches to enter into the Kingdom of God!" That is not a threat. It is a bare statement of a stern moral difficulty—how a man that has riches can keep God in this thoughts; how a man who is conscious of the power which property gives, can think of himself, not as a cause and creator, but as a creature and agent of God.

How rare it is that growth in wealth and growth in grace proceed side by side! It has been witnessed a thousand times. But the general tendency is for wealth to puff out a man's self, and to puff out self is to drive out God. If the sense of power were only wedded to the sense of dependence; if all wide opportunity were regarded as a great obligation; if every endowment which carries influence were regarded as a great obligation; if every endowment which carries influence were accepted as a sacred trust, then our richest men would be the humblest, and the sweetest simplicity would be found hand in hand with the greatest power. But where this is forgotten or ignored, when men think of wealth only as a power, and not as a trust, wealth creates division between man and God, for it inspires a man with the proud but empty boast, "I am a god, and I sit in the seat of God." "By the strength of my hand I have done it!"

Does it not behoove every one of us, whatever our gift may be, whether it be one talent or ten—and to every one a talent has been given—to solemnly consider our absolute dependence upon Almighty God? "Without him we can do nothing." He who had most strength had most to give account of. The ten talents and the one have come from the same source. Let us hold them as a solemn trust, and use them for the Master's glory, that when he cometh to reckon with us he may find that we have been loyal and faithful, and have not perverted to our own honor what belonged to him and him alone.

DAILY MEDITATION

The Divine Side of Things

SUNDAY, July 7. Isa. 6:1. "In the year that King Uzziah died I saw the Lord, high and lifted up." Isaiah had never had that kind of vision before. Most certainly he had had spiritual experiences, but never one in which the Lord was so exalted in overwhelming glory. And the strange thing is that the vivid vision blazed upon him through the pall of the blackest night. His ambitions had been dashed in disappointment; his life was lying in confusion. Uzziah had fallen, he who was "the pillar of a people's hopes," and it seemed as if the chariot of progress was irreparably overthrown. And it was in that dark hour, when the glory of Uzziah had vanished in death, and when Isaiah's own prospective glory had faded away, that the glory of the Lord arose like the rising of the sun after a black, tempestuous night. Isaiah had been too entirely engrossed with the human side of things. Now his eyes were turned to the divine side of things, and he began to live and serve in the consciousness of the glory of the Lord. "I saw the Lord, high and lifted up!"

And that is how we may test our trend and our progress in all these terrible days through which we are passing. Are our little gloryings fading away in the presence of something brighter? Are the mere stage-lights and the lime-lights going out? Is ambition changing into aspiration? Is sight becoming insight? Are we seeing behind the veil? Are we catching the vision of the divine side of things, the glory of the Lord? Is quest of personal glory changing into prayer, and worship, and consecrated service? Are we finding our God in the night? Do we see Jesus walking across the troubled seas? "In the year that King Uzziah died I saw the Lord!" J. H. J.

"Speaking the Truth in Love"

MONDAY, July 8. Eph. 4:15. "But, speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ." There is the story of a contentious man who said to his pastor, "I can not preach or pray or sing, but I can raise objections." Such men are not rare. There is one, at least, in almost every church, club, lodge, society of whatever kind. The critic is ever with us. And, candidly, we need him. We can not do our best work without him. He is like the brake in the mechanism of a motor car. He holds us back when we would go too fast. If at times he delays our progress, he is necessary to our safety. His conservatism counteracts the possible evils of radicalism. Much might be said for the economy of criticism.

But the method of criticism is also important. The brake should work smoothly. The critic need not destroy the organism he proposes to reform. Often the effect of his criticism is wholly destructive. Sometimes his methods remind us of the man who set fire to a barn to rid it of rats. A sensitive spirit who had been harshly treated by a critic retorted, "I know there is a cinder in my eye, but you can't remove it with a crowbar."

The apostolic injunction, "speaking the truth in love," gives the critic a safe rule of action. No truth, however severe, is unwelcome, if it be spoken in love. It takes the spirit of Christ to take the sinner by the hand the while we take sin by the throat. C. C. A.

Evil Associations

TUESDAY, July 9. Ps. 1:1. "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful." We have here some of the negative marks of the righteous man: his dissociations. By nature all men are ungodly; all sin, and all are practically scornful of God. If dissociation from these people implied local separation, the righteous would have to quit the world, as Paul has stated in I Cor. 5:10. The dissociations here indicated are, therefore, primarily spiritual and moral acts, and only by consequence and on given occasions do they become also physical acts. The righteous person meets with evil people in many of the common affairs of life, but he does not meet with them as a partner in their evil practices. He does not enter their assemblies to share their counsels and cooperate with them in their aims. He must often cross the paths of sin in the pursuit of his legitimate calling, but he does not turn from his own path of duty to walk in the paths of sinners. Where scorners meet he has no seat reserved for himself. In all affairs which concern his faith and conduct, the believer who has accepted the Word of God as his sole guide and norm cannot make common cause with men who deny what he affirms, or affirm what he denies, who love what he eschews, or hate what he delights in. "Be ye separate" is a standing rule of the Scriptures, enjoining a division of the righteous from the unrighteous. The believer in God's truth, the Christian who seeks to lead a blameless life in all godliness and honesty, must reprove, warn and argue with the unrighteous, and must endeavor to win him from the error of his way, and thus must manifest a true brotherly concern for the unrighteous. God thinks so highly of such separations that he has pronounced his blessing upon the believer who in the consistency of his belief effects such separations. The blessing of the God of truth, uprightness and holiness is surely a more valuable asset in our lives than the praise of men and fellowships who are not with God. W. H. T. D.

Believing in Christ

WEDNESDAY, July 10. John 3:15. "That whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life." When a person accepts Christ by faith, the Divine Spirit pervades his heart. A new atmosphere envelops his soul. He may not be able to analyze the change, but he knows that the whole scenery of his life has been glorified and the furniture of his being renewed and his ambitions elevated.

The crucial turning-point is to believe Christ's person as a Saviour and Christ's words of promise. We are not to be guided by present emotions or pulse consultation. We are to trust the Physician, without minding the explanation of the remedy or the diagnosis of the disease.

Those who are unable to argue, philosophize or reason, even the illiterate heathen, can believe, receive and rejoice in Him. It is not necessary to possess the power of introspection or spiritual analysis with which to examine inward experiences, but to trust wholly in Christ, who knows what is in man and will supply every need according to his riches. We calculate time by the sun and measure eternal years by faith in the Sun of righteousness. As the mind regulates the body, so faith guides the soul; as loss of mind ruins the body, so loss of faith imperils the manhood. The will, the emotions and the intellect become warlike without faith in the Prince of Peace. Faith is the dove of hope, bringing the olive leaf of peace to the troubled mind. Devoid of faith, imagination pictures a thousand ills that never come, while perfect trust, like a child, rests unafraid, untroubled in the arms divine. Faith gazes lovingly into the unveiled face of Him who is building mansions, and whispers, "Abba, Father, my Saviour! Mine forevermore!" Faith in nature's laws, in earthly things, is but a lower type of faith in the living God, for this is faith that works by love and purifies the heart. E. W. C.

"The God of Abraham"

THURSDAY, July 11. Ex. 3:6. "I am the God of Abraham." In these words in which God proclaims himself to Moses he also describes himself. We have a great light on the character of the Infinite Being in the simple phrase in which God identifies himself with one of his human children. If a man is known by his friends, as truly God is known by the people whom he calls his own. It is a great honor conferred upon us who bear the name of Christ. Is it not a greater one that God is willing to bear our names—to be known as the God of you and me!

What kind of a man was Abraham? Are we not anxious to know? Should we not carefully consider this point in order to judge intelligently the character of God? Abraham was a daring spirit, an adventurous soul, a man who hazarded "life, fortune and sacred honor" at the behest of an invisible Master. "He went out, not knowing whither he went." He sailed "under sealed orders." He had within him the making of a hero. He knew hostile conditions awaited him in the new land, but he was ever a fighter. If we have correctly analyzed Abraham's character, we have an index to the character of God. The God of Abraham is a God who sets a high value on heroism, on moral initiative, on the adventurous spirit who stakes his all on spiritual values. Donald Hankey says, "Religion is betting one's life that there is a God." To become a Christian is to make a great venture—a venture into the realm of truth, into the realm of friendship, into the realm of heroism. "The God of Abram praise!" C. C. A.

Hope in Midst of Despair

FRIDAY, July 12. Ps. 4:6. "There be many that say, Who will show us any good? Lord, lift up the light of thy countenance upon us." This text affords a glimpse of the desperate straits of David and his band of followers during the days when he was persecuted. While sitting in their camp in some cave or wild mountain ravine they would muse on their sorry condition, and a conversation would be started, the tenor of which would be gloom and despair. Their captain, David, was listening to their despairing remarks, when presently the anguished question would be raised: "Have we really any prospect of coming safely out of this predicament? Surely, we are all doomed men." And then the sigh burst from his oppressed heart which was to summon to his aid the unseen Friend and Protector.

From a common-sense view of his affairs and a reasonable survey of his chances for success, David would have derived as little encouragement and hope as his despondent companions. It is likely that he recognized the dangers surrounding him more clearly and took a more comprehensive and adequate view of them than his companions. A true leader usually does. His sigh and prayer to the Lord is a virtual confirmation of the worst fears of his companions: he knows of no help from men. As he mentally sweeps his eyes over the people from whom he possibly might expect help in his trouble, it seems to him that he is looking only into angry and discouraged faces. All either scowl or look glum, bitter, diffident. Then he thinks of the blessing which Aaron had been directed to lay upon the people of Israel, and the assurance which that blessing conveys is seized by him with eager longing: "O Lord, while every face around me is dark with despair, beam upon me with thy countenance lighted up with love and encouragement." The smile of Jehovah is worth more to him than the frown of the whole world. Thus hope which deals with unseen things as with present realities subdues despair because of the terrible things that are seen. Such hope in the midst of despair is the blessed heritage of faith in a God that has been reconciled to sinners and does not suffer his saints to be tried beyond their endurance. W. H. T. D.

Fear Is Lack of Faith

SATURDAY, July 13. Mark 4:40. "And he said unto them, Why are ye so fearful? Have is it that ye have no faith?" The disciples should have known that He who keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep. The Lord is thy keeper. When he seems asleep, like Jesus in the boat, he is with us just the same, never leaving us alone. We need not say, like the sisters at Bethany, "If thou hadst been here, our brother had not died." He is always here, nearer in mighty storms and rolling billows, if faith could only take the place of fear. Our Lord himself was ever calm in the midst of his greatest trials. How we dishonor him when we fail to trust him. How he loves to have us, like a confiding child, nestle in his arms, where trouble does not trouble and where peace prevails!

Elihu Burritt tells a story of a man driving cattle through a long, dark wooden tunnel. Some knots in the planks had dropped out, through which the sun made bars of light. The cattle shied at these rays; then leaped over them and made a terrible hurdle race of it, coming out at the other end covered with foam and blood. How much wiser are we, often crossing bridges that never appear! Do we not shy at heaven's light, fearing we could not endure its splendors? Should we not trust while passing through dark providences and be glad for the little light flashing through, instead of being like animals and children, full of fear? The fearful and the unbelieving will finally be cast away from the divine presence, for fear is a kind of unbelief which brings on the very evil which we fear. E. W. C.

GOLD

I STORED my gold away for future trust;
But when I came, there lay a little dust.

I followed pleasure's glad alluring face:
She left me in a sad deserted place.

I craved a quick success of clamorous praise,
To find a loneliness in famished days.

But one small thing I wrought of kindly deed—
One act of love—hath brought gold for my need.

The Gift of the Receiver

By
JEAN MAHAN PLANK

PETER surveyed me with the solemn countenance he always wears when he is about to make fun of me. He lowered his voice in deference to the occasion.

"Rosebud, I should call that"—he observed drily—"religion de luxe."

I shook my head and closed my eyes. He went on reading.

De luxe it surely was. It was eleven o'clock on Sunday morning. I was seated in an armchair before a fire of pine knots, was clad in my best blue linen negligée, and my slippers were thrust out toward the fire. My left elbow rested upon the chair arm, and I held in my hand the telephone trumpet. Close to my ear, with a personal effect that is not to be described, was being breathed a prayer that lifted my spirit up above the kaleidoscopic scenes of earth into the realm of reality.

It is a truism that "everybody in Pasadena goes to church," and it is characteristic of our climate that the going is made easy. If you want to be present in the body, you don't have to wear a hat; and if you want to appear in spirit only, there is the telephone, with the negligée, the easy chair and the grate fire. After I had sent Peterkind off to Sunday school that morning, something within me didn't want to go to church, so my indulgent husband reached for a book, and let me sink into rapt silence by the telephone.

The richly sympathetic voice of our minister was just closing the prayer when the sweet face of my "little nun," Miss Avery, passed the lattice and glanced smilingly in through the roses. I decided at once that she should have the treat of religion de luxe. She couldn't have it at her own bungalow, which was a rented one, for the telephone was different.

A HYMN was being announced in the service my ear was attending, so I laid down the trumpet and ran to meet my little nun. I called her that despite something attractive about her that made me feel I should like to possess her always and keep her near me; something fresh and spring-like; something delicately cheerful, like the untouched freshness of a carefully reared young girl. For there was a sense of mystery about her, a suggestion of having withdrawn from her world. She was past thirty and lived her life with a sweetly firm independence. I had noticed that when the subject of marriage was mentioned, her attention betrayed the curious interest of a maiden in an untried venture. Once, when reference had been made to an inharmonious marriage, tears came to the eyes of my little nun. She spoke resentfully:

"How could it be? How could they let it be? Why, marriage is—must be—like heaven!"

But never once, in the year she had been living near us, had she mentioned even remotely her having thought of marriage for herself. She lived in a tiny, picturesque bungalow at the back of the grounds of the Whitney house next to us, and she had under her care a crippled cousin, the legacy of an aunt whose memory Miss Avery revered as that of a mother. She had lived with the aunt since early girlhood, in some place in Canada. After the death, physicians had recommended California for the crippled cousin.

WHEN I pressed Miss Avery into my armchair and put the trumpet to her ear, her eyes sparkled and her face grew rosy with that girlish freshness of feeling she had. In Pasadena everything a bit strange becomes a great adventure; perhaps because of the constant suggestion of romance in the perfumed air. Miss Avery's glowing face was so delightful to look upon as she listened, that I tiptoed over to Peter, knelt by his chair, and slipped my hand through his arm, prepared to enjoy vicariously my little nun's religion de luxe.

To my amazement, she suddenly started forward and threw out her hand as if she would clutch at something. Then she sank back, and her face turned white. But as I was marveling that our pulpit should give out the cause of such an extraordinary effect, her face settled into its accustomed lines. I arose softly and went to hunt for a book in the rows of shelves with which Peter has lined the walls of our long living-room.

At the end of a half-hour, Miss Avery quietly replaced the trumpet and came across the room to where I sat. She was still pale, but her eyes were luminous.

"Thank you, Rose," she said; "it was beautiful." "Had you never heard Mr. Andrews before?" I drew her into a seat by my side.

"Never. His voice is—wonderful, isn't it?"

"Remarkably charming through the phone. What was the sermon about?" I laughed at the hackneyed question.

She smiled absently. "About—gratitude—the 'sunshine of the soul.'"

"That's queer." I held up a little blue book I still had clasped in my hand. "I've been reading this while your car went to church, and the writer says, 'A thankful heart is a fertile field.'"

The idea seemed to remind Miss Avery of something.

"O, yes, Rose—I came over to see you about some work the little club is doing—the one those girls coaxed me into joining, though I don't really enjoy clubs much. The girls are going slumming this week, they say—"

"Slumming—"

"They send out baskets every month to some poor families."

I wondered, then laughed.

"Slumming—in Pasadena! Where do they find the poor families?"

"They gave me an address—and told me to take a roasted chicken and some other things. I thought perhaps you would care to go with me."

"Care! This is a great adventure. I've read about slumming, but I've lived in Pasadena all my life, and I've never found any occasion to practice it. Peter, may we have old Fanny and the carryall? We can poke around in that and supply the suffering poor of this town with chickens—and marmalade—and you'll donate some flowers from the greenhouse, won't you, Peter?"

PETER'S face relaxed into a smile at my waxing enthusiasm. "You'd much better take them some kerosene oil and a stove," he said. "If they are tenderfeet, they are likely shivering in their skins at this minute, and cursing the climate. But I'll gladly adorn the expedition with floral offerings. Come over and help yourselves." With a look of having got off easy, Peter sank again into his book.

Miss Avery started home, and I, with my arm about her, went along with her. As we crossed the graveled road between the houses, we saw Mrs. Chittenden, a woman of stately, commanding presence, leave Miss Avery's door, and go toward her own place, a large, Eastern house in the grounds next Mr. Whitney's. Miss Avery drew back and touched my arm.

"Never mind," she whispered, "she comes often, and is so—patronizing. You'd think she was slumming when she enters my humble little abode at the back of Whitney's lot. Of course I'm immensely content with it," she added when I laughed in protest, "just what I want—but she is constantly bestowing things with a sort of air that suggests my inability to afford them myself. Perhaps I couldn't—my income is tiny—but if I'm satisfied with it, that's enough."

We went on to the stoop of her bungalow. The only thing about my little nun that seemed hard was that pride of independence. It was hard even for one whom she really cared for as she seemed to care for me, for she was always fencing. I could imagine that when the would-be benefactor was a woman who was both masterful and condescending, as Mrs. Chittenden was, the fence would likely be made of barbed wire.

ON the doorstep we found a basket of fine apples. Now, apples don't grow rank in California along with the oranges, geraniums and palms. Miss Avery's forehead contracted into what was almost a frown. She had not yet regained her normal calm sweetness of expression. Something about that sermon had made her nervous, and its message of gratitude had evidently not had time to sink in.

"Here, Rose," she said loftily, "take these home with you—to Peterkind. Do—please!"

I laughed scoffingly. "Well, I have never developed a proper pride. I confess freely that we don't buy apples now at the present price, and I'm delighted to get some—but only two or three—no more!"

She turned contemptuously away, and as I, amused, carried the basket into her pantry, she said bitterly:

"Well, why does she trouble me so? I don't want her patronage—even if I wanted the benefits. I like my own life. It suits me. But she constantly suggests changes, and lets me know that she will make them possible. I resent it."

She tossed the white gauze scarf she had been wearing upon the couch, and threw herself into a rocking-chair. Then she looked at me with guilty shyness, clapped her little white canvas-clad heels together, and half laughed with that sudden girlishness that always charmed me.

"We will salve our wounds tomorrow afternoon," I soothed her, "by bestowing our chickens and pies upon somebody else. We know how to do it now, for we can copy Mrs. Chittenden's manner."

Her face sparkled into a real laugh as I left her.

Peter's invitation to help ourselves was not ignored. When we started our carryall from the greenhouse, it had the appearance of a triumphal chariot loaded with potted plants, hanging baskets, and cut roses in abundance. We felicitated each other upon our delicately browned chickens and I had fairly robbed our larder, thereby bringing upon my well-fed household a salutary famine.

THE autumn morning had started with a veiled sunrise, and an hour later had come a shower that left the afternoon streets gleaming with a sheen of satin. As old Fanny trotted placidly under the magnolias, pools of water shone through the broad leaves of palm trees in the gardens upon either side. The air was still moist from the morning's rain, although the sun had outstripped the vapors and was shining with a smile less modest than is really becoming in a victor.

The part of town to which we drove was out near the cemetery where there are views that might make anybody with a soul content for an unlimited time without roast chicken. As we approached the number we sought, I had quaking misgivings within, for I was familiar with the penchant of effete Easterners for what they called "roughing it"—made easy like the church-going. The tiny, two-room bungalow stood in grounds that were quite bare. This did give an impression of poverty in a place where there is so much richness of verdure. The land had evidently been plowed for planting, and the purpose, for some reason, abandoned.

We stepped upon the porch at the same instant that a little woman with a very pale face, white hair severely worn, and dark, tired eyes that twinkled, came briskly to the open door. The eyes twinkled over our floral offerings before they looked into our faces.

"My!" she cried, "I wish you weren't mistaken in the place—but of course you are. Such an array of flowers!"

"No—we're not mistaken," trembled Miss Avery's voice deprecatingly. She was so fearful of doing things like Mrs. Chittenden that she was ready to grovel to our Object of Charity if need be. "We have come—"

But the opening address was checked by an audible gasp from the little lady. The twinkling eyes had espied the bulging forms of our roasted chickens protruding from the basket on my arm. Our Object clasped both hands over her mouth.

AT that critical juncture, we heard a conglomerate sound composed of squawks, cackles, and pipings, and around the corner of the house swept a brood of prosperous looking hens accompanied by their excited progeny. The little lady's eyes met mine, and perhaps found there a twinkle that responded to her own, for she broke into a frankly mischievous laugh.

"Detected," she cried, "caught in the act—with the goods—or whatever the technical term may be. I might have known it. Oh, do come in and hear my confession! Come—have a cup of tea with me—I actually have three cups—and some real Chinese tea."

Like a little whirlwind she flew at us, laughing all the time, and fairly pulled us and our offerings into the barest of living-rooms. A glance showed me, nevertheless, that the bareness was premeditated poverty. The seats were canvas deck chairs—the most sybaritic of resting-places. Around the walls were ranged unpainted pine shelves, and on the shelves were books and books, of a sort that I knew at once even Peter's loaded cases did not carry. In the center of the room was a big desk and a typewriter. That was all.

MISS AVERY and I got into two of the chairs while our Object whisked a bamboo tea table from the inner room, and a samovar from some other place. In front of us on the table she placed cups and saucers of egg-shell frailty, and then brewed some fragrant tea before she opened her heart.

Leaning back in her enveloping chair, she laughed again.

"I might have known it would be repeated; but those darling girls were such a temptation—too big a one for me. They came last month with their sweet, rosy faces lighted with expectation, and I could see as plain as could be that they were looking for it—hungry for it—I don't mean the chicken. I mean gratitude. Why, those girls—I knew from their dress—had all their lives been done for—always receiving. There had been no chance to give, except to people who already had so much that their thanks were mechanical. And now they were going to have a taste of the real thing, and I just couldn't disappoint them. My gratitude for that chicken was tearful. Fortunately I had locked my own chattering brood in the woodshed. I took all the things they brought, and accepted with becoming humility their evident sympathy for my bare floor, and lack of the customary appurtenances of life. One of the girls was of a practical turn. As they were leaving, she said with a wise look:

"Well, if the worst comes to the worst, you can sell those books. I know a place where they give ten cents apiece for old books. After I read my novels, I take them all there and sell them."

"As I'm working at an encyclopedia I think I'll have to hang on to my books if I have to live on the view—which I believe I could—almost. You see, I overworked last year—writing—so I thought I'd take up this work, which doesn't yet need to be hurried; and by coming out here where I could have air—" plenty of it—I could work and get back my health, too."

The little lady must have needed air, for her glib speech gave her scant time to breathe. My mind, however, caught curiously at something she had said, so when I saw a chance to interpolate, I seized it.

"Hungry for gratitude?" I wonder if that isn't something the world really needs. Why, that reminds me—I turned to Miss Avery, in whose face astonishment had replaced timidity—"you remember? Mr. Andrew's sermon Sunday about 'gratitude the sunshine of the soul.'"

THE amused smile on Miss Avery's face faded. Evidently that telephone service still had power to quench her spirit's joy.

"Yes," she answered lifelessly, "but he meant it was good for people to give gratitude."

"Well!" The little writer of big books took us up with a snap. "If gratitude is the sunshine of the soul, what's the good of generating sunshine if we don't allow some of it to warm the cockles of our neighbor's heart? That hunger for gratitude is a natural, normal appetite, and if we withhold the commodity when we could supply the need, we're as bad as speculators in foodstuffs. And, besides, on the other hand"—our Object laid in a stock of air again—"gratitude, when we give it freely, acts like a boomerang. Being grateful for good makes more good come. I don't mean"—she filled our cups again without paying the slightest attention to our protests—"that by thanking a person for benefits we stimulate him to do something more for us—as I've evidently done with your club by my weak yielding to impulse—but I mean, gratitude sent out to the Universal Heart—to God—and directed toward his agents of whatever sort, does bring more good."

"Oh!" I had one of my lights, as I call them, which seem to send into my mind words I don't remember having seen before. Under its impulse I was moved to interrupt the little lady. "Why, I must have seen it in one of Peter's books—that's my husband," I explained to our hostess—"something like that—it said, 'grateful hearts see bounty everywhere.' Perhaps the sunshine we generate lights up and shows us the bounty that is already there, and if we keep dark within, and refuse to generate the sunshine, we don't see it."

OUR Object glowed at me. "Now, isn't this"—she questioned gently—"isn't it just my boomerang? I shone on those little girls last month, and here I'm having this lovely visit with you two! Oh, I do wish"—the tired eyes twinkled toward the flowers, which we had deposited on the floor—"that a few of those posies might be included in the boomerang. Wouldn't I like to dig in the ground and plant those rose bushes?"

"Do!" I begged. "They are yours—we brought them to you." Then, freely offering up Peter's purse upon the altar of my gloating delight in the novel situation, I added: "Come to my husband's greenhouse when you're down town, and I'll help you pick out some lovely climbers and quickly flowering shrubs. Geraniums, too, will grow like weeds." I took up one of the hanging baskets and found a place for it in her stoop, and we all three exercised our ingenuity improvising vases for the flowers.

On the drive home, Miss Avery silently permitted me to free my mind of all the remarks I had to make upon our errand of mercy, after which she asked earnestly, as she adjusted a long scarf of blue gauze over her white straw hat:

"Do you suppose that is it? that Mrs. Chittenden really craves and needs a natural pleasure in giving benefits? I don't want to be as bad as a food speculator. Let's go right to her house, Rose, and get her off my conscience!"

THE vale of Pasadena was sinking into the shadow of the late afternoon, but when we stopped old Fanny in front of Mrs. Chittenden's broad palms, the whole length of the Sierra Madre was still bathed in a mellow golden light. While I wrestled with the halter, my friend stood silently looking up to where the tower of the observatory on Mount Wilson pointed upward like a white spirit-finger.

Mrs. Chittenden saw us on the gravel and came to the door with an eager light in her eyes. I'm not sure she saw me, but she did look hungrily at Miss Avery. My little nun did not make any half-hearted amends. She ran quickly up the steps and held out both hands to her persistent benefactress.

"You were good—if you were extravagant," she said sincerely, "to leave those splendid apples on my steps."

"Oh, did you like them?" The proud lines of Mrs. Chittenden's face softened wistfully. "My brother brought them—"

"I'm counting upon a real feast of them tonight," returned Miss Avery evasively. A sudden impulse made her lay her white arms with a girlish gesture about her neighbor's neck.

The older woman clasped the slender figure almost convulsively. She drew Miss Avery into the living-room. I, meekly following, heard her saying in an unsteady voice:

"My dear, something about you—I never had a daughter—never had any children, in fact, although I raised my little brother, Len—but sometimes it seems to me that if I'd had a daughter like you, I might have now a chance for happiness."

She seemed just then to become partially aware of me, and she made us both sit down with her in a triangle of easy chairs. She smiled dimly toward me.

"Did you hear him, Sunday?" she asked.

"Him?" I tried to think—and finally did, with contrition. "Oh—I remember now—you told me your brother, Doctor Voigt, was to preach in our church—and you told me to tell Miss Avery; but I forgot. I'm so sorry—why, Miss Avery did—"

I STOPPED, startled by something in my friend's eyes. She was staring with rigid intensity at our hostess, while she slowly drew her gauze veil up about her neck and as a partial shield to her paling face.

Mrs. Chittenden, without looking at either of us, seemed to be considering something. Presently she spoke.

"It may seem strange"—her eyes turned for an instant toward Miss Avery—"that I didn't ask you to meet him—my brother—although he was here for only one day. He is on a lecture tour. When he was nineteen, in his junior year at Princeton, he engaged himself to a girl of sixteen. A foolish—even a mad thing to do without the consent of the parents on either side." The speaker's lips closed firmly, then she continued: "I have a strong will. When I considered his career—he had already fully decided upon the pulpit—I made up my mind he must be saved at any cost. I was helped—fortunately, it seemed to me then—by the girl's people, whose views for her had received a severe check. I never saw her. Her name was Helen Allen. I met with her family. It was arranged that the two be wrenched apart without compromise, and no communication be allowed between them."

"My brother Leonard was a sensitive boy—almost morbidly conscientious ordinarily. I worked upon that sensitiveness by the plea of duty to our mother, who was an invalid of the sort that holds an entire family as bondslaves by an appeal of weakness. By this means, I kept him to the path I had marked out for him."

"He worked furiously for years, and with a

ONE of the most devoted missionaries known to the Christian Herald is Rev. T. J. Bach, whose labors in Maracaibo, Venezuela, have frequently been referred to in these pages. In the following letter, just received, the devoted missionary tells of an experience that will touch many hearts. How to educate the children is a problem which has vexed the soul of many a worker in the foreign field, where school facilities are practically unknown. How the problem was solved in the present case, the letter tells. Any reader interested in Mr. Bach's work can address him in care of the Christian Herald.

IT is about thirteen years ago since we stood on the streets of Maracaibo, Venezuela, then a city of about 55,000 inhabitants, and without a missionary. The city was known to us as having a very hard climate. Its inhabitants had never given a welcome to any of the few colporteurs who had been there to do a good work. Rev. J. Norwood had recently been rescued by the American Consul from a mob which had decided to put an end to his colportage work. It was a new mission field to us. After about one week's search we found a house, but were not permitted to stay, as we desired to open our doors and invite the people to come and hear the Gospel. But the Lord provided another house for us.

The first two years we held meetings but we had not one service in peace. We were disturbed in every way, but those who disturbed us then are now among our friends. The many stones which were thrown at us through the windows and doors were gathered together, and about a year and a half ago, when laying the foundation for our new mission station, we used those stones and thanked the Lord for the good material. The new mission station was dedicated the last Sunday in March.

Among the very few things we had with us when we began the work was a small printing press, bought for $35, which represented a wedding present given us by a Young People's Society. A month after our arrival we began to reach the people by small tracts, and a year later we began to publish an evangelical paper, the first and the only one in the republic. The name of the paper is "La Estrella de la Mañana," and by God's help it has led many to the light and truth as it is in Christ. It has pleased the Lord to grant us his blessing in our effort to make the Gospel known through the printed page. We thus we have had the great privilege of reading the Bible through almost twice. May I say that we have never considered it unprofitable, neither a loss of time.

The republic of Venezuela is distinhave eight native men working in the mission printing establishment, and the presses and stock in general are now worth about $7,000. In the morning, before beginning the day's work, we gather for prayer; we sing two songs and read a chapter of the Bible, and guished for its great natural resources of all kinds, for its very limited number of missionaries, and no public school building. Venezuela has twenty states and two large territories, and only four of those states have missionaries, which leaves sixteen states without a missionary. Truly the harvest is great and the laborers few. According to one reliable informant, during the four hundred years of the existence of Venezuela as a country, there has only been built one school, and that was a military school, which means that Venezuela is today without a public school building, or a single playground for children. What would the United States, our beloved country, have been today without the Bible and the public school?

We have not been able to build up a primary school. Beside the evangelical press, the Lord has blessed our efforts for his cause so that we have now an organized church, a Christian Endeavor Society, a Sunday school and a bookstore where we have Bibles and evangelical books. Our plans for the future include a school for children.

When our two oldest children, who are now ten and eight years, reached the school age, we began to ask ourselves what to do to obtain an education for the children. Through the kindness of the Christian Herald we were informed about various Christian institutions for children, but it would take our entire allowance to keep the two children in one of those excellent homes. After much consideration and prayer, we decided to bring the children home to the United States. We consider that the greatest mission field the Lord has given us is the little hearts of our children. But our hearts are not only attached to our children, but also to the field to which we have been called. We recognize the right of our children, but also our duty toward Christ and his call. Love and duty constrain us to separate for some years. My wife will stay home alone with the five children with which the Lord has blessed us, and I shall return to the field, God willing, within four months. We have never considered it a sacrifice to do the Lord's will. And although we may daily feel how hard it is to be separated, we shall, by God's help, work with joy to train the head, the hand and the heart for Christ on our two separated mission fields.

Yours truly in Christ's service,

T. J. BACH.

With all the resources of the government libraries and departments and of the public museums and their staffs and with the active assistance of national experts this Information Bureau is ready to tell you the answer to

Whatever You Want to Know

The bureau is prepared to answer fully and promptly questions regarding food production and conservation, transportation, industrial activities, history, patents and inventions, pensions and army insurance, legislation, exploration and discovery, government employment, and all of the thousand and one things that you want to be sure of.

Inquiries must be accompanied by a stamp to cover postage on the reply. Answers to questions of general interest will be published in this page. Watch this page for special offers of helpful material.

Questions and Answers

READER, Elmira Heights, N. Y. The high cost of living and the constant demands upon a minister's pocketbook compel him today to make many sacrifices and deny himself many things that he deems necessary. This, however, is not the case with the rank and file of the membership of our churches. The working people earn a weekly wage, ranging anywhere from $20 to $50, perhaps in some cases more. If the price of living has soared, they have received a higher scale of wages to meet it, with 50 to 100 per cent. extra for overtime, and they complain that they are underpaid. Yet they think that the minister should be able to pay his bills, meet the increased cost of living, pay liberally to Liberty Loans, War Chests, etc., on salaries ranging from $15 to $18 per week. The churches ask for trained men, young men, men of ability to fill the pulpits, men who in other professions and in positions of responsibility could earn from $2,000 to $3,000 a year, and yet the churches ask these self-sacrificing ministers to work for the amount earned today by any laboring man of ordinary intelligence, unskilled and uneducated. Is it right? I know a minister who the other day had a position offered to him, with a salary to begin at $2,500 and all expenses. Who would censure him if he steps out from the meager salary paid by his church and accepts the position? Would any church member refuse it? You may publish this letter if you so desire. It may reach the heart of some conscienceless church members who are enjoying all the comforts and luxuries of life, and wondering why God is not blessing the churches, while they ask their minister to live on starvation wages. In view of these facts, it cannot be said truthfully today that "ministers are preaching for the money that is in it." Indeed, no! The above conditions make it imperative for the minister to curtail, economize and sacrifice. Therefore I am compelled to say "good-by" to the Christian Herald with all its wealth of information, education, and inspiration. Believing that "the workman is worthy of his hire" and wishing your splendid paper every success.

We gladly give this letter space in the Mail-Bag, from a sense of justice to the ministers, a very large proportion of whom are sadly underpaid. There is probably no class of workers that feels more acutely the pinch of the high cost of living than the preacher who is struggling to "keep up appearances" on a meager salary. Our correspondent writes with considerable feeling, but in describing his own case he outlines the condition of thousands of other ministers who are making a brave but almost hopeless fight and who deserve better treatment from their parishioners. Denominational boards now have their sustentation funds for the superannuated pastors. But the boards and the congregations give altogether too little thought to the domine who is still in harness struggling along with his family, very likely on half rations and doing some lively economizing to keep out of debt on a salary which even before the war was ridiculously small, but is now "genteel starvation." In the present case, we could not think of cutting off our friend's copy of the Christian Herald, which will go to him every week, with our earnest prayer that his congregation may make an effort to help him to find life more tolerable by a raise of salary. A faithful laborer in the Master's vineyard deserves better treatment.

S. E. B., White Creek, Wis. Students of bird life are agreed that the English sparrow is harmful alike to our crops and to birds that help our crops. It is claimed that they chase and destroy bluebirds and wrens, which are voracious bug-eaters, while this sparrow eats only grain and fruits.

R. R. H., Watsonville, Calif. 1. America's aims in the war have been clearly stated by the President to be on the side of justice and righteousness. 2. The church you mention plays no greater or less part in the war than do the churches of other denominations, most of whom are straining every nerve to be true to their calling—loyal, helpful, cheering and consoling.

Mrs. O. D. C., Lowell, Mass. 1. In reading the Scripture, one must be mindful of the habit of all Hebrew writers of indulging in poetic reference to familiar things. So in I Cor. 15 : 20, the allusion to firstfruits is a beautiful reference of this character, touching on a common occurrence. On the morning after the first Sabbath of the Passover season, a sheaf of the firstfruits of the barley, freshly reaped, was waved before the Lord as a joyous pledge of the full harvest to come (Lev. 23 : 10, 11, 15, 16). Paul, in his writing on the Resurrection, mind means to love him with all our strength and with supreme affection; with the heart as the seat of reason and intellect; with the soul having sentiment and passion; and with the mind controlling our thought and will.

N. A. M., Wedderburn, Ore. 1. In Heb. 2 : 5, 7 the writer is showing how Jesus in his earthly state became as man—in all things as we are, yet without sin. The taking on of our humanity by Christ raised the whole human race to a point of superiority over the angels. 2. The Beast in Revelation is representative of the power which is said to have throughout the world's history opposed God—sometimes identified with a persecuting church—sometimes with a civil power—sometimes with the great Antichrist yet to arise, who would wield universal powers and practice many abuses. 3. According to Gen. 10 : 2, Magog and Meshech were sons of Japheth, son of Noah, whose descendants made war on Israel, as related in Ezek. 38. 4. We cannot enter into a discussion of poison gas, or other barbaric ways of warfare.

M. E. F., Bandon, Ore., writes: "In references to the genealogies of Jesus, lately discussed in the Mail-Bag, Farrar's theory may be of interest. He says that Salathiel, son of Neri, became heir to the kingly line, and was therefore called, according to custom, legally the son of Jeconiah. To quote Farrar: "Matthew gives the legal descent of Joseph through the elder and kingly line; Luke, the natural descent. Thus the real father of Salathiel was heir to the house of Nathan, but the childless Jeconiah (Jer. 22 : 30) was the last lineal representative of the elder kingly line."

Mrs. G. M. Memphis, Mich. Mark, or John Mark as he is called (Acts 12 : 12), was not one of the Lord's original disciples. He was a Jew, probably a native of Jerusalem, where his mother Mary resided (Acts 13 : 12). Mark was probably converted by Peter, who frequently came to his mother's house. Many connect Mark with the earnest young man who followed Jesus on the night of his betrayal. In Rome he appears as a companion of Paul. He is called "the interpreter of Peter," and some suggest that the Gospel according to Mark is based on a diary of Peter, sketching his full impressions of events as they occurred.

Mrs. O. D., Myton, Utah. In early days the tithe was generally a tenth part of the produce of the land or the flock; later it became a tenth of the profits of personal industry of any character. There is evidence that at certain times it may have meant a tenth of one's entire possessions. The modern interpretation would limit it to a tenth of the increase, though there are many good people who still hold that a tenth of one's income should be set aside for the Lord's use. One who wishes to tithe his estate should reckon on the increase in value, or number, or whatever form his available assets may assume, excluding, of course, his necessary expenses. Many good Christians make the Lord their partner, after deducting all necessary expenditures, and give to his work freely of what remains. A subscription to a religious paper should certainly not come out of the tithe, but Red Cross donations and any funds spent in doing good rightfully belong there. A sick friend, a needy soul, a good work of any kind, are objects that are particularly adapted to be the recipients of our tithing money. Tithing is now a question for the individual conscience.

J. C. V., Emerson, N. D. 1. Those sects and denominations that recognize the divinity of Christ are nominally Christian. 2. See the articles now running in the Christian Herald on Revelation, by Dr. Gray and others who have made careful study of the subject.

H. W. F., Central City, Neb. There are unfortunately many people, admirable citizens and good church members, who are weak Christians because they have not put on the "whole armor of righteousness." The class to which you refer—the church members who seem to put Christian principles on one side when they support men for public office who may be corrupt and unfit, certainly do wrong. If they could see their duty clearly, their influence might be used to better purpose. But it is an extremely hazardous thing to drag the church into politics, and except in cases of very great provocation we believe the church does wisely to avoid it. We think this view is held very generally. In recent years those churches that have got mixed up in politics have found to their sorrow that it was a step which brought disastrous results, as it split the congregation into partisan fragments and in several instances at least did more harm than good.

E. S. P., Tacoma, Wash. God is served in many ways, and we have no doubt that many are really serving him unknown to others and possibly misunderstood. Do not let us judge any one, but leave that to Him who alone can read the hearts and minds of men.

M. D., Inavale, Neb. Christ says, "Ask and ye shall receive." His disciple says: "This is the confidence that we have in him, that if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us" (I John 5 : 14). Another tells us that the grace of God that bringeth salvation has appeared to all men. We are also taught to pray for all men, and such prayer is acceptable to God (I Tim. 2 : 1-3), and that the prayer of the righteous shall be heard (Prov. 15 : 29). Why then should we doubt that God will hear our prayers in behalf of a dear one's salvation? John 14 : 14 and John 16 : 23 are certainly meant for us, and have been the consolation of countless saints.

The Flag That Stands for Home
By Margaret E. Sangster

A WOMAN'S face and a woman's smile, and a flag that stands for truth,
On the shrine of these we gladly lay our dreams and our gallant youth;
At the foot of the throne we have made for them we kneel, and our eyes raised high
Can glimpse the stars on a garment's hem and the blue of God's own sky!

A woman's face and a woman's smile, and a flag that waves unfurled,
This is our symbol, the pledge of faith we show to a war-worn world;
This is the sign of our will to fight, and the proof that we dare to die;
This is our password through the night, our prayer and our battle-cry!

A woman's face and a woman's smile and a flag that spurs us on,
On though our souls be sore with dread and our faces pale and wan;
We walk toward a vision mile on mile, though far from our land we roam—
One woman's face, and one woman's smile, and the flag that stands for Home!

employs a spiritual parallel when he speaks of Christ's resurrection as the firstfruits of those that slept.

H. C. Y., Tolleson, Ariz. A commentator writes concerning the subject of your question: "Christ did not know the day and the hour of his future coming. This seems to have been a voluntary self-humiliation in knowledge, a part of Christ's humbling of himself (Phil. 2 : 8). Christ could of course not lay aside in the incarnation the essential attributes of his divine nature, such as eternity, but he could by an act of his will limit his attributes of power and his knowledge, and refrain from their use, as far as it was necessary for his humiliation. His voluntary not knowing, or sacred unwillingness to know, the day of judgment during the days of his flesh is a warning against chronological curiosity and mathematical calculation in the exposition of Scriptural prophecy. We cannot know more than Christ himself chose to know in the state of his humiliation."

T. W. W., Byron Center, Mich. 1. Elijah appeared with Moses at the Transfiguration. Some commentators hold that both Moses and Elijah were honored with an anticipatory resurrection. 2. To love the Lord with all our heart, soul and

"Our Daily [War] Bread"

ANEWLY enrolled member winds up the discussion upon the Garbage Pail in merry wise:

Ancient that Garbage Pail, allow a personal reminiscence:

Some years ago, we occupied an apartment in which no one had ever lived, the building being entirely new. A garbage pail and a waste paper basket were supplied with the apartment. I directed that the pail be left in the basement store-room until such time as melon rinds and corn husks should arrive. The janitor asked, "What do you do with your garbage?" Without realizing his ignorance I immediately answered, "We don't have any; we eat it!" Meaning, of course, that nothing was wasted. So the story went its way: "Them folks in No. 8 is funny ones! They eat their garbage!" Peelings and coffee dregs go down the sewer pipe at my house.—CLARA D. F. (Chicago).

Our vivacious correspondent promises other scraps of personal reminiscence and present experience, which we anticipate with pleasure.

Pardon me for calling your attention to a discrepancy in your recipe for boiling rice. You admonish us wisely to waste nothing, yet tell us to drain off every drop of water after the rice is boiled. There should be no water when the rice is ready for eating!

I learned to cook rice from a French woman and she of a French chef. Measure half a cup of rice; let the water run on it a while; rub occasionally to remove the glazing. Add seven parts of salted water to one of rice. When the salted water boils drop in the drained rice. Let it boil fifteen minutes so hard that every kernel "jumps." You may stir it two or three times during the first five minutes. When the time is up, remove from the fire; cover closely, over hot water; put a weight on cover to keep it down. Leave it for a couple of hours. It will swell and absorb all the water. Dish carefully and serve. It has never burned in the least with me, and is always white, tender, and each kernel almost stands alone. Should there be any thin part it is lovely added to vegetable soup. I do not waste a bit.—S. S. R. (Michigan).

THE recipe for cooking rice of which I spoke as the "one and only right way" was learned in a rice-growing country. So far as I have any knowledge of methods of preparing the valuable grain for the table, I rated this as the best. Before thanking you for that learned from a Frenchwoman, I would subjoin to my formula what should have accompanied it at the first insertion. The water drained off from cooked rice should never be thrown away. If you have no present use for it, boil it for ten minutes more, salt to taste and set aside for a foundation for soup. Some of us have heard the story told by a guileless missionary of the "self-denial" practised by his native cook during a famine, in sending the cooked rice to his employer's table and contenting himself with broth based upon the water in which the rice was boiled. The good man was greatly relieved when a wiser brother explained that most of the nourishing properties of the cereal were left in the water. It is well for our housewife to recollect the anecdote in cooking rice, barley, hominy and macaroni. Each supplies what old-fashioned folk call "substance" to broths.

The formula for cooking rice in the French style is attractive. Will our cooks introduce it to vary the domestic bill of fare that now includes rice in some form several times during the week?

"If there be a better way of doing anything than mine I would learn that way," is a capital working motto in every department of life and service.

FROM far-off Colorado we have a letter so replete with interesting matter that the "limitations of space" seem tyrannical when I reflect how much profit and pleasure fellow students in our new school of housewifery could draw from all. She has kept such intelligent watch upon the Corner and contributes so generously to wants therein expressed, that all we can slip into our weekly bulletin will be treasured:

I should like to pass along to the Corner some of my favorite methods of helping Mr. Hoover.

I find a very good substitute for wheat flour may be made from ordinary rolled oats, by passing them through the food-chopper, using the next-to-the-finest plate. This results in a very nice oat flour, fine enough to sift through a flour-sifter. It has all the binding qualities of wheat flour, and can be used as a substitute in wheat bread with highly gratifying results. It does not make the bread "sticky" when you knead it, which seems to be a common failing with all the other flour substitutes. To use it in yeast-bread, I simply add it to the sponge just before I work the bread up stiff. I have used this oat flour and white cornmeal, 12½ per cent. each, making the finished product 25 per cent. substitute, by simply scalding the cornmeal with the potato water when setting potato yeast the night before baking, and adding the oat flour the next morning, when ready to stiffen the bread. This makes a splendid bread. I am not sure that it is better than all-wheat bread, but it is just as good. Of that I am positive.

I am greatly in favor of this method of using meal in wheat bread, because of two advantages it has over any other I have tried, namely, the bread rises much more quickly than plain wheat bread ever rises, and by treating the meal in this way it does not turn sticky; hence the dough is as easily handled as in pure wheat bread.—Mrs. H. L. D. (Colorado).

If we needed corroboration of the announcement, oft-repeated by the Food Administration, that the conservation of wheat for patriotic purposes is the principal problem before us at this juncture of national affairs, we have it in the accumulation of letters dealing with this very thing addressed to the Corner within the month. While other topics of weight to practical housemothers will be duly considered, we cannot shirk the obligation to devote much space to the main object of our present "reasoning together." All correspondents, in dealing with this, admit that the abstinence from the comely, toothsome wheaten loaf to which we have been accustomed all our lives is objected to more or less vehemently by some or all members of the family. Nearly all confess that they are already "tired of war breads"; some that they dislike cornmeal. Our course is plain; it is the part of sensible, patriotic men and women to bow gracefully to the inevitable, and after exerting ingenuity and skill to make the obnoxious substitute as palatable as possible, to bring philosophy and will into play and make up our minds to overcome repugnance and "finical" fancies.

I AM never more proud of my sister housewives than when I watch their cheerful obedience to the new laws laid upon them and the clever devices brought to bear upon the situation.

Let one or two more letters illustrate my meaning:

Some Conservation Thoughts and a Call for Help

The call for help comes first. Can any of you tell me how to bake "light" bread from "war flour"—that is, wheat and barley ground in a common feed-mill? I have tried hard to do it, and failed, but I can make delicious muffins by using sweet milk and baking powder or sour milk and soda (no fat)! So now, when I bake muffins, I make enough over to put into a loaf tin and bake. It is very good cold. But I find I must use one egg to each cup of milk. Here is my recipe:

Two eggs; two cups sour milk; two teaspoons soda; one teaspoon salt; flour for thick batter. Dissolve the salt and soda in the milk; add the flour to form stiff batter, then break two eggs into the batter and beat thoroughly! Put into hot greased tin and bake twenty minutes. The rest of the dough I put into a square tin (hot and greased) and bake half an hour. I forgot to say that the wheat is "macaroni wheat" and mixed with barley and ground, so, by adding eggs, bread resembles corn bread but is fine!

If the family tire of Johnny cake on wheatless days, try my plan. We grind pearl barley through a coffee mill and it makes delicious "gems."—J. F. McK. (Montana).

I wonder if I can help just a little in the solving of some of the problems of your Corner of the dear old Herald?

Here is a drop biscuit that we enjoy very much, with honey or syrup:

One cup rye flour; one cup rice flour; one-half teaspoonful of salt; two teaspoonfuls baking powder, sifted together, wet with milk or milk and water until it will stir just comfortably. Then drop by spoonfuls on a hot greased griddle and set in the oven for twelve or fifteen minutes to brown. No shortening is needed, as the rice flour is short and crumbly. Try them!

Also add one-fourth cornmeal to pie-crust.

—BESSIE W. (Florida).

The cornmeal question gets me worst of all in the matter of substitutes. I should like to know how to use it, combined with flour, in making good bread, biscuits, etc. I should be most thankful for information upon this point.

—Mrs. H. B. (Indiana).

For the encouragement of this perturbed member, I subjoin a communication by the Director of the Food Administration Committee:

Going without wheat is an inconvenience—nothing worse—for homes in comfortable circumstances. I believe that nothing else that we can do just now will bring us such a feeling of helping in the great fight and of sharing our abundance with others, as giving up wheat bread entirely.

Gospel Missions in Convention

By JOHN C. GOODE

CHARLESTON, W. Va., where the International Convention of Gospel Missions was held, is a fine little city of thirty or thirty-five thousand people, in a rather narrow valley on the Kanawha River. There are many fine buildings and handsome residences, and the beautiful green hills are round about the city. As was said by the psalmist of old, so can be said by the people of this city: "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help," for those hills are filled with coal and oil and other mineral wealth, and the prosperity of the people comes from the hills. The State Capitol looks like the administration building of some university, with its ivy-covered walls and venerable-looking tower, and the little park in which it is set looks like a campus. The Y. M. C. A. is directly opposite the State House, and in the same park is a fine modern building. There the Sunday afternoon meeting of the Convention was held. There was an address by Governor Cornwell, welcoming the delegates to Charleston. Patrick Withrow, superintendent of the Union Gospel Mission of Charleston, is doing a fine work. Pat, as every one calls him, is very popular and well liked. He is building a new hundred-thousand-dollar plant, and has also seventy or more children under his care, and they are certainly good, healthy-looking little folks. At the Friday night meeting the children sang as a choir, and Mr. McCarthy of Joliet Mission, Mr. Balevre of the Bowers Mission, Mr. Green of Washington—who is doing a work among the Jewish people—and myself, also spoke. We touched on the Christian Herald Prayer League work and the Brotherhood work of the Mission. There was a fair audience, although the night was warm and close.

The various mission workers, headed by Brother McIntyre of Philadelphia, asked us to join in the outdoor meeting, held opposite the Y. M. C. A., on the lawn. A crowd gathered, and the singing and talks were good. After the meeting, we all piled into the bus and went slowly through the main street, singing the old Gospel hymns. The people looked at us in wonderment. I don't think many of the people ever heard or saw such a sight.

The talk with which the president, Mrs. Whittemore, closed the indoor meeting, was an inspiration to every one.

I was assigned a church the next evening. Sunday I was sent to a little church in West Charleston, out near a great government steel plant. It was very warm, and we had a congregation of perhaps seventy-five. They listened attentively. Mr. Balevre made the closing prayer. The church was called the Sixth Street Methodist Church, West Charleston.

We had the big meeting of the Convention in the afternoon at the auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. Hon. John Sherman Darst, State Auditor, had charge of the meeting. He made a forcible address, and in the course of his remarks said that the reason why he loved mission workers was because they took the Bible as they found it, literally.

GOVERNOR CORNWELL gave us a gracious welcome and spoke splendidly about the work that was being accomplished by the agency of missions and the urgent need of the enlargement and continuance of the work after the war. Mr. Withrow and Mr. Ward each spoke about ten minutes. Mr. McIntyre followed, and in the course of his remarks he said that one of the war problems confronting rescue missions was the dealing with unfortunate girls who frequented the neighborhood of encampments.

I spoke in a little Methodist Church on the outskirts of Charleston, to a small congregation. The minister was a fine godly man, and the congregation was friendly.

Monday the discussion in the Convention was mainly upon the work of rescue missions during and after the war. In a town like Norfolk, where the conditions at present are abnormal on account of the enormous number of soldiers and sailors in that vicinity, the mission is very busily engaged both in rescue work and social service; but in other cities the work is greatly curtailed. The consensus of opinion seemed to be that the missions should begin work among children and start homes or orphanages. Others thought that in the near future there would arise an occasion for help and work among women, owing to war conditions. Many of the mission superintendents told me they were court parole officers serving without pay, and through that means many men were paroled in their charge and taken to the mission. There are great possibilities here.

Many of the missions are starting work among children now. Mrs. Bennett of the Union Gospel Mission, Washington, told us about a Children's Home to help mothers who had children that were small; women whose husbands had deserted them, or who, through other causes, were forced to make their own living and would under those circumstances have to put their children in institutions; and other mission workers emphasized the importance of rescue missions engaging to some extent in work among the children.

I was impressed with what Mr. Kratzig said about the probation and court work in which his mission is such an important factor in Norfolk, and the idea was brought forward to make the missions the agents through which the charities of the section in which the mission is located would be distributed. There is a change coming, both social and economical, and it is a hopeful feature that mission workers recognize it and are studying the best way of meeting the changed conditions that are coming.

Adventures in Neighboring

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

A HAPPY Birthday to you, dear neighbors!

You have no birthday in July? Ah, but our Mother has, on July 4, and (as she is very dear to us) we must do something to honor her.

What shall it be? A parade? Perhaps. Just as a starter. But that's not enough. It seems to me we ought to make this Fourth of July (this whole summer, in fact) different from any other.

We ought to fill it so full of brotherly love and good cheer and high aspirations that the echo of it will ring around the world.

This war-torn old world of ours needs just such a message. Our men in the trenches need it. Their lonely home folks need it. Indeed, every one needs it, you and I included.

So let us open our hearts, and give. Not money (this time) but optimism. There isn't one of us but can offer some inspiring side-light on the war. Perhaps this side-light may be just what a discouraged neighbor is starving for. Possibly our whole town would be helped by hearing of it.

I feel sure it would. So I suggest that we set apart in July or August a "Good News Day,"—gathering the whole community together for an exchange of good war-news, everything gloomy being forbidden, and the platform (which could be a kitchen table on somebody's lawn) being yielded to one volunteer speaker after another, each being allowed one minute.

A minute is enough. In that time a letter from the trenches can be read by a proud mother; or a new war-joke told, or a thrilling battle described; or some beautiful, touching incident related; or a cheery bit of home-town news made public.

Between speeches, of course, patriotic songs would be sung by all present. And oh, how I should love to stand out in the road—near the lawn or grove or meadow you had gathered in—and listen to that singing!

Neighbors, won't you try out this plan some time during July or August, and write me about it? For the best letter I receive by September first, describing in detail a "Good News Day" held by a village or community in response to this appeal of mine, I am going to pay ten dollars; and for all other letters on the subject I publish, one dollar each. I will not publish any of these letters until after September first; but will devote one whole issue of the department to them in September.

So I hope, fellow idealists, that you will set to work—just as soon as this issue of The Christian Herald reaches you—to plan out your town's Good News Day.

Meanwhile, just for the joy of it, let us take a peep into other towns and villages, to see what patriotic adventures in neighboring they are having.

OUR first one is so beautiful—so holy—that it needs no comment. Read it, brush away a tear, and feel your heart fill with love for your fellow man!

A Village Adopts a War Baby

The adventure in neighboring I have to tell of occurred in a little village in southern Kansas, where my son lives. The young girl of my story grew to womanhood there and taught school in that vicinity for two years before her marriage. And there, on February 27, 1916, she and the man of her choice were married.

A little new home was begun, with every promise of happiness. But over a year ago Robert W. (hearing his country's call) went to the war; and the brave little bride, as other brave brides have done, made him good-by and went back to close their home and carry a holy secret all alone.

After a time a young mother trod the wine-press alone—went down into the valley of death and never returned. She gave the world the life of a man-child in place of her own. The young husband came home on furlough, but could get no extension of time, and returned to camp a few hours before she passed over the river. He was allowed to return for the funeral.

It was a sorrowful time, for this was the first war sacrifice in that little town. The funeral was held in the church to which both belonged and where both had taught in the Sunday school. The neighbors had been all kindness before; but now, how their hearts and hands went out in sympathy! I will quote from the weekly paper published in the little town. "This bereavement of Robert W. and baby John Robert and relatives is our bereavement—our community's. She is our dead, and the motherless babe shall be ours. His health and happiness shall be ours, and his education. And when he is grown to the stature of his soldier father, we shall tell him what a treasure he is, in view of the sacrifice."

Nor were these vain words, spoken in haste. For I can tell you a little about what that village has done. There were debts and doctor bills, incurred during several weeks' illness, to be paid; and there were funeral expenses. So the neighbors quietly raised three hundred and sixty dollars, and met these obligations.

And when it was thought best to sell the furniture that was stored, it was sold at public auction at a good price, and the proceeds used to buy Liberty Bonds for little John Robert W. And all these good friends expect to see that the little fellow and the relative who cares for him do not want for anything until after the end of this cruel war.

Surely, dear adventurers, the war has its silver lining, if it is bringing out in us such nobility as this! I felt a tightness in my throat as I finished reading about it. I wonder if you do not all feel that way, too?

OUR next adventure is of entirely a different type. It is a jolly one, of interest to young folks:

Patriotic "Sings"

Let me tell you how our Christian Endeavor Society is doing its hit to help ruralites come into a broader and fuller degree of patriotism.

While farm life is the pleasantest and most wholesome way of living, it has its drawbacks: one of the greatest of these being lack of social opportunities. So what this band of young people is doing is really much needed, is practical, and is not hard to do. In this region many of the parents have automobiles, and the young folks have the use of them on Sunday afternoons: taking long pleasure-rides. Recently, instead of wasting gasoline and wearing out cars uselessly, our C. E. young people have been successfully bridging the gap between themselves and the young folks of nearby communities by "mixing." By mutual agreement, all meet at a country schoolhouse or church and spend at least an hour singing patriotic songs. If there is a Sunday school, they go in time to help with that, and then sing afterward. Sometimes they take musical instruments along. Sometimes they "hunch off"; each party going to a different district; and thus help a number of communities on the same day.

This plan of "patriotic sings" has been a great success, as it has enabled the young people to have their auto rides, enjoy the fresh country air, come into much-needed contact with others of their own age, stand by Uncle Sam, and benefit others—all at the same time. Isn't this worth trying out? Mrs. H. R. G.

Most decidedly it is, neighbors! And autos aren't necessary to the fun. Many towns are so close together that the members of the C. E. could walk to and fro. I think it is a delightful idea, and I hope it will be adopted in other communities besides this one in Nebraska.

BUT, while speaking of patriotism: I read the following letter from a Christian Herald neighbor who has been an invalid for twelve years:

Self-Denial to Buy Bonds

DEAR NEIGHBORS: I have started on the most wonderful adventure! I have signed a pledge to buy a fifty-dollar Liberty bond, and have paid in my first two dollars on it. I, who have practically nothing, can buy a bond in this way: For some time I have longed to do more than a hit, and now I have done it! And I am so glad! It will mean sacrifice, but I am prepared for that. I am going to pay for my bond (as I did for membership in the Red Cross and a donation to it) by denying myself certain things tempting to an invalid. I am saving in all ways possible.

I do not eat meat any longer, and I gave up a favorite breakfast food, also persuading my son to give it up. We have substituted for it breakfast foods made of material not needed for shipment to our Allies. This was a sacrifice we were glad to make. We hardly ever have cake in the house: so save on sugar, white flour and shortening. We live on vegetables, fish, fruit and milk chiefly; and eat bread containing the least wheat-flour possible. I hear there is a wool shortage; so I get able to wear clothes. I'm not going to allow any one to buy me any wool ones. I have plenty that are almost as good as new (though twelve years old) because they have had no wear. As for style, that won't bother me. Perhaps there are some, in my position, who think there is nothing they can do. But they can do something: they can sacrifice! I will tell you how I help the very poor: When a case of need is brought to my attention, I give to this case whatever sum I expected to lay out on myself that day for something I do not feel the want of afterward.

However, feeling this want is more than made up for by the joy that floods over me because I've done a good deed. Perhaps it is because I have heard the wolf of want trying to enter my own door that I have such sympathy for the very poor.

AN ADVENTURER.

P. S. I did not get my letter off before the Christian Herald of May 1 came; and as I saw from its page on the Third Liberty Loan that it wasn't optimistic about the Loan being fully subscribed, I sent my son out to buy another fifty-dollar bond on the instalment plan. How will I pay for it? Really, I don't know. But I will! For I prayed before I bought, and I seemed to be told to do it. So I have no anxiety whatever.

There are some acts of heroism, dear adventurers, so breath-taking that comment is futile. I read this letter, gasped, read it again, and published it here. It filled me with humility and respect, and made me doubly proud of being an American!

These are all the adventures we shall have time for today, neighbors, if we are to include the Forum. And we must include it this week, as it is full of hints and appeals and other good things: like a bright mirror held up to life.

First, however, I should like to speak of the fact that I am still paying a dollar for every published adventure (I have had numerous queries about this) and that your letters and adventures are as welcome at my desk as a personal call from each one of you would be, were you passing through my town.

WITH which message I shall bid you godspeed for another two weeks, fellow members of The American Community Club; promising you, for next time, as blithe and rollicking a club meeting as today's has been earnest and patriotic.

The Neighbors' Forum

DEAR NEIGHBORS: I know of a Christian Herald subscriber who lives in an isolated place and is very lonely indeed. I would be so glad if you could send her some reading matter, letters or cards: anything to make her life more happy. I will give her name and address to Miss Connolly. Mrs. M. A. McF.—

I have been reading the Neighboring page in The Christian Herald with much interest, and have been wondering if you can put me in communication with deaf people. Some good might result therefrom. I have been deaf since a small child, and it is a lonely life, to say the least. NEIGHBOR.

W. H. C.: To interest children in church attendance, St. Luke's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., held services at five in the afternoon, right after Sunday school: the school marching in in a body to seats assigned them, and the older pupils occupying the choir stalls. There was no sermon, but there were many hymns. I have found individual friendship with pupils the best way to interest them in church work. Invite the class to your home for an afternoon of games, then perhaps two or three for a walk, then just the one boy or girl for personal help with school work, let us say; and the door is open for a talk about Christ and his Church. Deaconess May Shepperson, Lakewood, New Jersey.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: I shall be very glad to have your plan for the formation of a community club for boys and girls: the meetings to be held outdoors during the summer. Will enclose stamp for plan. Affectionately your Neighbor, Mrs. G. W. B.

I read, in the March 13 issue, Miss Alice R. Thrall's request to you for any name of an infantile paralysis victim. My daughter cannot walk from the effects of that dread disease. Has a wheel chair, and can read and write very nicely for a child of eight years. She would like to be put in touch with the Polio girls. VERMONT NEIGHBOR.

[DEAR ADVENTURERS: I have put this little neighbor in touch with the Polio Club. But it has occurred to me that other young members of The Christian Herald family might like the joy of sending her some token of interest and friendly affection. If so, send your greetings to me, for her, and I will forward them. VERA L. CONNOLLY.]

A gentleman of large possessions was once showing a friend the extent of his domains. "Do you see the hill in the distance?" he said. "That is mine, and the clump of woods on the right, that is mine also. And that road way off to the left bounds my lands over there." His friend said to him: "Do you see that small house just under the hill? In that dwelling lives a woman who can say more than this." "Well, what can she say?" His friend replied: "She can say, 'Christ is mine'."

And here is a gay hit of verse from our friend, Miss J. T. B.:

QUESTION

Won't you buy a thrift stamp
Little girl or boy?
Won't you buy a thrift stamp,
Bring to others joy?
Every penny that you give
Helps some other one to live.
So deny yourself, my dear,
Just to bring a bit of cheer,
To our Allies o'er the sea.
Save the world for liberty.

Won't you buy a War Stamp
Every maid or man?
Won't you take a liberty loan?
Sure! Buy all you can.
Give until you can't give more:
War chest, "Y. M.," as before,
This is what saves you and me!
All the world, for liberty.

—JESSA BURKHARDT.

Yes, now we have a World-Hall club,
For neighbors all who venture well;
We trust it is well organized
With faith and love, for deeds will tell.
May noble thoughts our hearts inspire
And nobler deeds be ours, and then
To keep in mind what angels said,
Its "Peace on earth, good will to men"
Ycs, "Peace on earth, good will to men."

Christians and Jews Worship Together

A FEW weeks ago a remarkable congregation assembled in the beautiful synagogue, Seventieth Street and Central Park West, New York City, to mark the hundredth anniversary of its fourth place of worship, but really to open a new movement—to unite Christians and Jews in the higher problems presented by the war; among the problems, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth.

Little was said of the joint worship at the time. But it was so significant, and its initiative thought, to unite Jews and Christians in worship, is so important that some notice should be drawn to it.

The congregation is the oldest Jewish one in the country. It applied for its burial ground in 1665. It met for worship in a private house until 1674, when it hired the loft of Hapording's Mill on Mill Street, now South William Street, which had been vacated by the Dutch Reformed Church. The first Jews, on their arrival, demanded the right to serve in the town guard. It is interesting to know that the grandchildren of Haim Solomon, who at that time financed the American government in a certain operation, are members of this congregation.

But though the Christians and Jews fight shoulder to shoulder in the front abroad, train together in the camps here, unite in Red Cross work, in Liberty Loan activities, and in drives for war relief, it is something new for Catholic, Protestant and Jew to be invited to unite for spiritual effort, for united supplication, and above all for a presentation of the higher aspects of the war.

The call was issued by the minister, Rev. Dr. H. Pereira Mendes, who has been the church's pastor for over forty years. He has long advocated religion in its highest meaning—union of all religions for ethical purposes. Hence he worked with the late Bishop Potter and helped Dr. Hegeman in the great guild work, the Guild for Crippled Children, a work that lives today in active operation. He stood by Dr. Parkhurst in his memorial anti-vice crusade over twenty-five years ago, and is today a member of Bishop Courtney's interdenominational committee.

CHRISTIAN and Jewish clergy and laity, by attending the service, demonstrated that one of the results of the war may well be the drawing together of all men and women, regardless of the color and cut of their religious clothing, for the true purposes of man and the higher purposes of God. Many letters from prominent Christian clergymen unable to attend were received, expressing the deepest sympathy with the movement. The deep significance of the gathering and the presentation of effort for spiritual union were the theme of the prayer. The speaker said:

"It is one hundred years since we consecrated our fourth synagogue and over two hundred and sixty years since Hebrew prayer first voiced human aspiration in this country. But what is a span of one hundred or of two hundred and sixty years in the life of a race and religion that have existed already for three thousand seven hundred years and feels itself possessed of a vitality that shall mean three times three thousand years more? We are a deathless nation, so saith the Holy Word: 'But as for me, this is my covenant, my Spirit which is upon thee, and my words which I have placed in thy mouth shall not depart from thee nor thy children, nor from thy children's children, throughout eternity.' (Isa. 59:21.) . . . We are banded together for this war; we will fight it to a finish because this Bible, this Holy Book, condemns disloyalty to sacred treaty, the disloyalty of old Philistia, condemns war on the sick, the weak and weary and the non-combatant as waged by ancient Amalek. Germany is guilty of both sins. We fight against the old Germany in order that a new Germany may be born, may be uplifted, 'consecrated,' regenerated.

"But when this war is over and we have won, as win we will, we must wage war against all hatred and revenge that will obtain after war. This is the Bible aspect, this is the teaching of the law, the Bible. 'Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart' (Lev. 19:17). 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself' (Lev. 19:19). 'If thy enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; if he be thirsty, give him water to drink' (Prov. 25:21).

"We are assembled before our common Father, as Christians and Jews. We are all alike children of the Father of us all. It is time that we drew more closely together or religion becomes unreality and even mockery. Let us all tonight unite in prayer for those who have fallen in war, whether Catholic, Protestant or Jew. Let us unite to ask wisdom for our leaders, whether Catholic, Protestant or Jew, and to this end I ask you to join me in prayer."

A concluding hymn, a benediction, and the assembly dispersed, deeply affected.

Lessons from Favorite Parables

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Mark 4:1, 8, 26-32

THE parable of the Sower is one which has a double lesson for all Christians. Christ said that the seed was the Word, and that it was sown in the hearts of the people. Are we indifferent? Are our hearts stony ground? Are we carried away with the purely physical pleasures of this life, so that we have not time to cultivate the Word sown in our hearts, and to prevent its becoming choked by the weeds of selfish indulgence? Are we harboring sins which make it easy for the evil one to neutralize the Word that falls into our hearts, or are we keeping our hearts fallow ground, enriched with frequent seasons of communion with God in order that his Word in our hearts may grow and abound? We are ourselves the soil in which the seed is planted; but if in us it grows and multiplies, we become sowers in our turn. But there is more to sowing than the mere scattering of the seed. Ground must be prepared, and if we would sow for the increase of the Kingdom, we must plow, harrow and fertilize before we sow, and this plowing, harrowing and fertilizing requires the utmost skill. We are dealing with other human hearts like our own. By our teaching and by our example we must prepare the soil for the precious seed of truth. Instruction will do little without example; example will instruct mightily without any attempt at teaching. Thus the little word that we have spoken, sunk in a heart which our thoughtfulness, or our kindness, or our fidelity, or our manifest walk with God has prepared, may grow into a great tree of Christian life and influence; perhaps overshadowing any attainments we ourselves have reached. The humble rector's wife, Susannah Wesley, became famous through the sons she reared, as did the mother of St. Augustine; but the one who sent Peter the Hermit on his crusade is unknown to fame. Elijah was only Elijah the Tishbite. The mother who prepared his soul for God's message has her reward, but posterity knows not her name. The humble lamplighter is but a passing shadow in the dusk, but he leaves an avenue of radiance behind him. So the humble planter of seed may sow for the harvest of an hundred-fold to be reaped by other hands. But the sower and reaper shall rejoice together in that day.

Twenty Years Service in China

REV. ROBERT R. GAILEY, of the Princeton University Center in China, will shortly return to America, on his way to France. Mr. Gailey has just completed twenty years of service in China, during most of which he has been the representative of Princeton University. He will take charge of the Young Men's Christian Association work for the Chinese coolies now in France, and will probably be there for the period of the war. Mr. D. W. Edwards, also of the Princeton University Center, has made a trip of inspection among these men, and is now on his way back to Peking.

WE have just received a letter from the old pastor in Washington who has been so nobly helped by the readers of this journal, in which he says: "I send my heart's deepest gratitude and pray heaven's divinest benediction upon the Christian Herald readers. My nervous troubles cause me a great deal of suffering, and unfit me for any and everything. I hardly ever write now at all, and have waited several days this week to feel myself in condition to scribble these lines. My doctor insists that I stay in the sun and air all I possibly can, and this I try to do."

The old pastor, whose wife died last year, is now well advanced in the seventies.

Knowledge Is Power

ALL readers of The Christian Herald are invited to this feast of reason. All you need do is ask.

There are many things you want to know—or should know. Sit down now, write a letter to the Washington Information Bureau of this paper and find out whatever you want to know.

What can we tell you about food production, preservation, transportation, industrial activities, patents, pensions, army insurance or government employment.

To make it easy for you to get the information you need, we maintain, at our expense, in the national capital, an Information Bureau that has all of the resources given by the great libraries, the official departments, the public museums and the government experts.

The following are typical questions and answers taken from the correspondence of the last month.

Are the interned Germans paid and why? Are they prisoners of war?

ANSWER—Interned Germans in this country are not prisoners of war. They are paid by the United States government for the work they do. There is a Hague Treaty which provides that prisoners of war shall receive the pay of their rank from the country holding them. This does not apply to interned officers and crew of a merchant marine, or civilians.

Do soldiers and sailors have to pay full railroad fare?

ANSWER—Director General of Railways McAdoo has issued a proclamation stating that all soldiers and sailors should only have to pay one cent per mile. This order takes effect June 10, 1918.

How many negroes are in the Army?

ANSWER—There are about 157,000 negro soldiers now in the National Army. Of these 1,000 are line officers holding commissions of captain and first and second lieutenants. There are two divisions of negro troops. These divisions embrace practically all branches of military service.

How many congressmen are there now according to the present apportionment?

ANSWER—The total apportionment for the United States is 435.

All you need to do is to enclose a three-cent stamp, for return postage, and a personal letter of information will be sent you, in a sealed envelope.

Palace Building

I READ a poem by Rudyard Kipling last night, a poem that began:

When I was a king and a mason, a worker proven and skilled,
I started to build me a palace, such as a king might build.

I read the poem to the end, and then I laid the book down and let the lesson of the poem sink into my heart. For though the story that the poem told was a simple story, it held a very real lesson.

The poem told of a king who decided to build a beautiful palace—a palace that would stand always as a monument to his name. And it told how the king, as he and his workers started to dig the cellars of the palace, came upon the ruins of another palace that another king had evidently started to build. Rather jumbled ruins they were, and the king, looking at them, felt that his predecessor must have been a poor sort of a builder. And he laughed at the clumsy piles of stone and the blocked-up labyrinth of alleyways; laughed until the shovels of his workers laid bare a legend that was carved on a bit of stone-work—carved by the hand of that other worker.

The king stooped over to read the words that were carved into the stone, for he realized that the other king, though doubtless a poor workman, had left the message in good faith. What he read was simple—just a sentence that ran like this:

After me cometh a builder—tell him I, too, have known!

The king puzzled over the words as he went on with his task. But even as he puzzled, he worked—worked so that his palace would be all the things that that other palace could never be. He made his plans with care, profiting from the mistakes that the other king had made.

The days went on, and, as the foundations of the palace grew, the king began to realize that he had been intolerant when he at first had laughed at the work of that other man. He began to realize that, after all, there had been a plan in the jumble of ruins—that the crumbled piles of stone had once been fashioned into broad staircases, that the blocked-up alleyway had once been stately halls. And he began to respect the work and the spirit of that other builder. And he began to use slabs of the old granite to strengthen his new foundations and blocks of the old marble to beautify his new entrances. He even pounded old bits of rock into new mortar. And he found himself doing it with reverence, because the realization had come to him that the other king had built as bravely and as honestly and with as deep a purpose as he himself was building.

And then, one day, came a summons, —the great summons that one must obey. And the king knew, with a pang of regret and heartbreak, that his palace would never be finished. And so he called to his workmen, bidding them lay aside their tools, and looked long and wistfully at the palace that was just beginning to show a promise of the beauty that he had desired it to show. For, having heard the summons, he realized that his palace was only a beginning, and that it would never be finished. And he turned away with a sigh. But before he turned away he did a bit of carving on one of the marble arches, just as the other king had done. And the poem ends with the words:

Only I cut on the casing, only I carved on the stone,
"After me cometh a builder—tell him I, too, have known."

I READ the poem last night. And knowing it for an allegory I let its message sink deep into my heart of hearts. This is the message:

The world is full of would-be kings, who are starting out, all in good faith, to build beautiful palaces. Some of these kings are artists, some of them are poets and writers, some of them are plain business men, and some are just simple home-makers who are trying to fill their niche in life. And the palaces that they are starting out to build are the palaces of work that is well and successfully done.

Very few workers who are real workers with real plans ever feel, when the great summons comes, that they have more than begun what they started out to do. They feel, as the king felt, that their palace is just beginning to take shape. But if they are real, worth-while, kingly workers they will have that palace standing so that new workers, with new palaces to build, will find their work and profit by their mistakes and use their stones for foundations and their crumbled archways for mortar. And they will carve, somewhere, for these younger workers to find, the words of that first king:

After me cometh a builder—tell him I, too, have known!

And if they do that, their work, although to them it may seem unfinished, will be of real value.

No worker, no matter how jumbled the ruins of the palace that he leaves may seem, is a failure, as long as he leaves something behind him that will help somebody else. It may be only a lilting snatch of song that he has left, but if that song creeps into a heavy heart and makes it lighter it is worth while. It may be that a bit of a drawing, thrown unframed into a corner, may give inspiration for some great deed; it may be that the memory of a clean, pure life—just a memory—will keep other lives clean and pure.

O you who are building palaces (and every one of you is, I am sure, building some sort of a palace!), build with an eye to the future. And sometimes, at evening, as you look back over the work that you have done through the day, find the time to wonder whether what you have done will ever be of value to any one else. And if you realize that it won't be of value, turn to the palace of some other king who has passed on, the palace that has helped you, and pattern your ideas and ideals on his foundation.

From Our Bookman

Keeping Our Fighters Fit. By Edward Frank Allen. Written under the supervision of Raymond B. Fosdick chairman of the War and Navy Departments' Commissions on Training Camp Activities. With a special statement written for the book by President Wilson. The Century Company, New York City. $1.25.

THIS is a book which every father and mother of a boy in our army or navy ought to read. It treats of the varied activities of the government and the organizations approved by the government, in the several army camps and naval barracks, for work along social and educational lines for the benefit of the soldiers and sailors.

It may be well doubted whether the average person has any idea of either the extent or scope of these activities, and how they are making for increased efficiency of body and mind among our soldier boys. Particularly is this true of the more important agencies for developing the intellectual faculties of the men, by providing facilities both for individual reading and for instruction in varied subjects. The objective sought to be attained is well defined by Secretary Baker in his instructions to Mr. Fosdick, who is at the head of this gigantic undertaking.

"I want them (the recruits) to have an armor made up of a set of social habits, replacing those of their homes and communities," writes Mr. Baker, "a set of social habits and a state of social mind born in the training camps—a new soldier state of mind, so that when they get overseas and are removed from the reach of our comforting and restraining and helpful hand, they will have gotten such a state of habits as will constitute a moral and intellectual armor for their protection."

This is the first time in history that work of this character on so large a scale has been undertaken by any government. In view of the importance of the book in an informative way to those remaining at home, the President has contributed an eloquent foreword.

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Our Next-Door Neighbors. By Belle Kanaris Manlates. Boston: Little, Brown and Co. $1.35.

A VERY bright and amusing little book, and cleverly written. The story deals with the experiences of a childless couple, who suddenly become responsible for a family of five boys, ranging from ten to two years in age, and all imbued with the decided spirit of mischief which finds vent in many unexpected ways. While some of the incidents are perhaps slightly forced, these imperfections are readily forgivable, in view of the spontaneity and freshness of the author's humor, which is at once piquant, delicate and kindly. The book can be strongly recommended as an antidote to the blues.

Pan-Germanism Versus Christendom. By Emile Prum. Edited and with comments by René Johannet. George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.

A VOLUME founded on a letter of Mr. Prum, leader of the Catholic party in the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, to Mr. Erzberger, the chief of the Catholic Center Party in the German Reichstag. Mr. Prum, who was originally German in his sympathies and strongly anti-French on account of his Catholicism, changed his attitude partly on account of the German invasion of Belgium and Luxembourg, but more because he considered that the past history and present acts of the Germans regarding the Catholic Church constitute a menace to the continued existence of that church. The book contains an interesting historical sketch of the Kulturkampf of Bismarck's time and its sequel, as well as much data, unobtainable elsewhere, concerning the German occupation of Luxembourg. Mr. René Johannet, the commentator and editor, expands and amplifies Mr. Prum's original thesis. A valuable book for the scholar and historian in many respects, as a source of material.

Reading God's Word

International Sunday School Lesson for June 14
Acts 8:26-39 and Psalm 19:7-11

A Call to Biblical Preparedness

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

TODAY we study the second of our practical lessons on the Christian life. Those who outlined the course put Bible Reading directly after Beginning the Christian Life. Were they right? If so, what shall we say of those Christians who try to advance in grace and knowledge without ever turning the pages of the Book of books?

The other day, a soldier who had recently enlisted sent me a letter asking me to send him at once a manual of arms. He was under discipline, attending drill, being instructed, but he wanted also to keep up with military preparedness for himself! How many Christian soldiers, immediately upon enlisting for Christ, secure their copy of our Manual of Arms and are not content with hearing sermons or even attending a class, but read their daily marching orders for themselves? Not a majority, one ventures to say.

The Christian Army—Is It Prepared?

We have heard a great deal of late about the inability of even the most zealous patriots to defend their land without training. Men say that a million raw recruits would be driven like chaff before a trained army corps or two. What then is the outlook for the Church, which is the standing army of the Kingdom of God on earth? Its nominal membership is counted by millions, yet its progress against the forces of sin is slow indeed. Can it be that the Church army is not fully equipped according to the regulations as found in Ephesians 6:13-18? In all that magnificent statement of the preparedness of the Christian soldier, I would only single out one item—"the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God." How many, think you, can handle it effectively as a defensive weapon against temptation, as an offensive instrument to put error and injustice to flight? Do our Christian soldiers know how to handle their weapons? About fifty per cent. of the church membership come out once a week to witness their leader indulge in a half-hour of sword-play in the pulpit; but let us ask how many open their own Bibles during the week? It is sad to know that, when the emergency comes, too many find the sword rusted into the scabbard, and they can get no comfort or help from the arsenal of Scriptural truth. So the Church is like Xerxes, who wished that he had as many soldiers as he had men!

Let us pay our tribute to the modern Sunday school, which has given to thousands of us a measure of acquaintance with the Word of God. How thankful we should be to its founders, its faithful supporters, its gifted leaders! But consider the brevity of its sessions, with at best a half-hour a week for actual study. No wonder its most earnest workers feel that it is superficial. Then consider the lack of participation by the home, and by the scholar, compared with the public school's thorough-going support. How difficult it is to get children to come with prepared lessons! How hard to secure cooperation in the assigned readings and home work! Brethren, these things ought not so to be.

No wonder a young sailor wrote me that he had two Testaments in his kit, but did not know where to read, and "always seemed to hit upon the wrong places and got discouraged." He greatly appreciated a list of suggestions for various occasions. We might all of us send such a list to our boys in the service. But how came it that he spent twelve years in Sunday school and then made such a confession as that?

The Importance of the Bible Today

The great leaders of the past whose work endures were men of the Book. Take names so diverse as those of Thomas à Kempis, John Bunyan and Abraham Lincoln—one a medieval monk in a monastery, the next a traveling tinker turned preacher, the third a mighty statesman. Each has left the impress of his life in written words still treasured and influential. Through them all flows the living water of the Scriptures. My copy of a Kempis is annotated on every page from Holy Writ. Bunyan had nothing but a Bible and a vivid imagination to guide his renewed heart. Lincoln's presidential messages thrill with the spirit and even the phraseology of Isaiah and the Psalms. The Bible, through men who read and pondered its messages, has molded much of the history of the past.

The Bible is the guide-book for the future. We are fighting a world war for democracy, but the very fundamentals of democracy are found in the prophets of Israel and the Christian brotherhood of the New Testament. We are struggling with the problems of liberty, license and autocracy just as Jesus did, and Paul. We are trying to teach the stewardship of wealth and the moral aspects of labor and capital. The Gospels sound this note consistently and with unescapable point and directness. We are actually adopting the ideal of the world-wide Kingdom of God as a national policy, pledging our Republic to the unselfish teachings of the Son of Man.

Not only so, but personal righteousness, self-sacrifice and service are becoming public and universal matters of conviction and debate. The guidance of the Holy Spirit will result in new and epoch-making consecration. Therefore we must read and study the Bible as never before.

A Busy Man Who Found Time to Read the Word

Our lesson text pictures a man of affairs, a financier of great authority, who found time to go to church, and who did not stop at that, but made time to read the Scriptures. "Sitting in his chariot reading." Have you ever seen a man in an automobile reading the Bible? There is no one so busy that he cannot deliberately and resolutely set aside a little time every day to bathe his spirit in the refreshing fountain and give direction and poise to his whole life. Busy? Yes, we are and we ought to be, but do you know any one who cannot do the thing he really wants to do with all his heart? The more rushed we are, the harder pressed, the greater our need for a few minutes when we shall be still before God, when we shall consider and weigh the value of life according to the eternal standards.

Professor Soares makes a fine suggestion for the busy: Set yourself to study a little every day, taking forty years to complete your task! But do one-fortieth this year. Of course, he means, do something now. Abler and busier people than you are at work. Don't be a slacker in preparing to serve the Kingdom of Christ.

A Prepared Teacher Who Guided Another

The business man of our lesson was interested, stirred and perplexed. There have been many like him. While there are parts of the Bible plain and easy enough for a child, the greatest messages are frequently not so simple after all. This book challenges the very depths of one's resources and sends him humbly to some one who knows more. It has been well said that millions have learned to read just to read the Word of God. It is also true that thousands have learned to read Greek, just to penetrate deeper into the text, and some of them shoemakers and farmers, not men of leisure by any means. Hundreds of thousands have followed teachers, purchased helps and maps, attended schools, even traveled to Palestine to learn more.

Philip was ready to help the busy man. His was the joy of the modern pastor to whom some earnest layman comes for light. He made his explanation very simple and very direct, and it led to results. Ancient tradition spoke of the far-reaching effects of Philip's words through the Ethiopian. Suppose he had been unready! But he was a trained teacher, who had a twofold preparation; he had studied with the apostles and he had a vital Christian experience of his own. He was no mere theorist. He could speak with unanswerable logic concerning what Jesus meant to his soul. The man who knows will have joy in telling others.

The Best Aids to Preparedness

This lesson conveys a bit of a hint of what has been to countless disciples the surest road to Biblical power: in a spirit of consecration begin to teach others. Friends, the Sunday school teachers know the Bible better than other Christians. Would you know it better than you do now? Take that class of boys, or of girls, acknowledging your own need to God. Never begin to prepare a lesson without the humblest prayer. Go to the class with the lesson mastered, having made the most of your concordance and helps. This method is, to my mind, the best.

Call on Philip to help you! Don't be proud or aloof in your chariot of ignorance, but ask advice from pastor and friend. Be sure to have a few of the best books, where the Philips who have gone on before, and some who are far from your city, have recorded their interpretations of the revelation of God in Christ. Hundreds of fine, helpful guides to Scripture are available.

Don't be content with crumbs of texts, but assimilate good slices and whole loaves of teaching. It is so much more rewarding to make a thorough study of a Bible book than to read scattered texts. If possible, preserve the results of your labor, making outlines on the blank pages and marginal notes of the best things where they will be instantly available in the future. They make that Bible your Bible indeed.

Last of all, maintain the twofold use of the Word, for study and for devotional guidance. The study will make your prayerful reading more helpful and practical. The reverent reading will bring the lessons home to your own spirit.

Grateful for Help

SOME time ago the Christian Herald published an account of a teacher in Louisiana who with his family was suffering severely from the high cost of living and the impossibility of making a meager salary feed his household. A number of our readers kindly sent contributions in response to the appeal, and these were forwarded to the teacher in question, who now writes:

"Kindly allow me to express my gratitude for the aid that came just in time, through your kindness in publishing my letter in the Christian Herald of March 13. I have no words to express my gratitude. May heaven reward those whose hearts were moved to assist one truly in need. I am thankful to say that conditions here are improving in school matters. The pay of colored teachers is now $30, $35 and $40 for third, second and first grades, respectively, which is far in advance of the former salary of $20, $25 and $30. The high cost of living, however, is such that it is impossible for one to lay aside anything for a rainy day. Again thanking you for all your kindness to one who, with a family of eight boys and four girls, is doing his best to make the world better because I live in it. I am, etc."

selflessness that seemed to me saintly. He never mentioned the girl, and her people took her away—I never knew where. I was sure I had done the right thing—but as the years passed, and his strength increased as a man, he refused even to consider marriage. I mentioned it once to him. I found he could be as stern and strong of will as I, and I never spoke of it again; never even dared to introduce him to a young woman.

"Our mother finally passed out of our lives. I married, and consequent changes came. Then, one day, when taking in his mail, I saw a letter among the others that had on it, 'return to writer.' It was addressed to Helen Allen. He was hunting for her.

"Well—I've never told this to any one before." She looked again at Miss Avery. So did I; but the light in the room was shaded by the approaching twilight, and the filmy folds of her blue veil were drawn quite about her face. Mrs. Chittenden, noting this, and thinking of draughts, stepped to one of the windows and closed it. "I did what I thought was right," she said once more. The words had the dreary sound of many repetitions.

SHE had started back to her seat when Miss Avery spoke, in a voice I did not recognize.

"What of the girl," she demanded, "what may have been her life through the years? She is—must be—a woman now, if she lives."

Mrs. Chittenden paused by the younger woman's chair, and gazed down with a deeply troubled expression at her favorite, who seemed suddenly to speak with the tone and manner of a Nemesis.

"Well—she may now be happily married, and most satisfactorily established in life. I could almost wish—he might find it so."

Miss Avery, with a quick, indrawn breath, and a gesture that might have meant many things, arose to her feet. The older woman put out a hand and would have spoken, but the sound of a rapid step on the veranda stopped her. She turned nervously, and swept the room with her eye. It seemed as if, under the stress of emotion so long concealed, her instinct was to thrust it and us out of sight.

"Something has happened," she said in a hoarse whisper, "there he is!"

But the rapid step was already at the door, and a voice—a really wonderful voice—was saying:

"Where are you, Edith? I found I could have an evening with you—"

He saw us, and a professional mask flashed over his face. His sister's nervousness, however, found relief from an unexpected source.

Miss Avery suddenly dropped the gauze veil from her face. To my astonishment, the deathly pallor had vanished under the glow of roses that rushed to her cheeks. Her eyes were sparkling. Her head was held high, and never had I seen her look so beautiful.

Leonard Voigt, with a startled word, dug his fists into his pockets. A bewildered frown creased his forehead as Mrs. Chittenden began stammering an introduction:

"Miss Avery—my brother—"

Quickly but with calm dignity, Miss Avery stepped nearer to Leonard Voigt, and extended her gloved hand.

"The name Avery will mean nothing to Doctor Voigt," she said. "It was my aunt's—but I am Helen Allen."

THEN I beheld a marvelous thing.

It may be beautiful to see a boy and girl in the first blush of the wonder of falling in love; but it is a marvelous—a rarely marvelous thing to stand by and see love sweep down and enfold a man and woman who have been waiting for each other—waiting through what must have seemed an eternity of years. With a quick stride forward, Leonard Voigt seized almost roughly both of Miss Avery's hands. His gaze searched every line of her face.

"Helen—Allen!—my Helen?"

But Miss Avery's fresh girlishness reacted from too quick a surrender, and the sparkle and flash in her eyes told him that ample chance would be given for a second wooing; whereupon he began the wooing at once by leading her out the door, down the steps, and across the lawn to where a rose-vined pergola lent aid and abetment to his high purpose.

I turned awkwardly to Mrs. Chittenden, but she had fallen to her knees with her face buried in her hands. Finding myself of even less importance than a Greek chorus, I went home, trembling as I went, to think of the wonders that might never have had a chance to happen if my little nun had not gone to shine upon her benefactress.

DEGRADED TO THE RANKS

The True Story of a Man's Redemption

He was a captain in the British Army. Before his fellow officers, his shoulder straps were torn away. Many a man who had gone that black road before him, had gone steadily down to oblivion and despair.

But he was a man of sterner metal and in the burning cauldron of this great conflict he found a way to climb back from despair—until now he is back again in his high place.

What he did and how he did it is just one of the human race today is climbing through suffering and despair to new heights.

Why This Edition Is Given Away

We feel that volumes like these, with so important a message, should not be sold, but should be given away, as far as possible. Therefore, as long as we can, we will give these sets free to those who read the Christian Herald and the Review of Reviews. We should like to make this a permanent offer, but the price of paper is going so high that we do not know what another edition will cost us. As long as this first lasts you can have your set free.

This nation has stepped out of its swaddling clothes. It has, in a day, towered above the rest of the world. Today we have our hands on the money—the trade of the world. And the American citizen must grow tall with his nation. You must touch the ends of the world with the fingers of your mind.

You should have the Review of Reviews—that daily, hourly feels the pulse of all the world. Now, as never before, you need Frank H. Simonds' crystal-clear, month-by-month articles on military operations of the war. You need, more than ever, Dr. Shaw's world-wide understanding of affairs.

For 25 Years the Greatest Monthly Newspaper

THE Review of Reviews is the world's greatest monthly newspaper. Its editor, Dr. Albert Shaw, has for 25 years been foremost in interpreting lucidly and authoritatively the month's history and personalities to the American public.

In the present year particularly, Mr. Frank H. Simonds has given the magazine a new distinction as a reporter of the war's current history.

Mr. Simonds is nothing less than a genius in giving his brilliant yet simply drawn word pictures of the movements of the greatest war in history. Do not miss the Review of Reviews this year.

OVER 200 TRUE STORIES OF THE GREAT WAR

Real experiences of real people—written to the music of guns. From out of the holocaust of nations, the high, unbreakable spirit of man leaps forth in story after story.

For these 200 stories all the smoking, shrieking battle-fronts of the war have been ransacked. In these volumes, the theories, the practice, the prophecies of war have no place.

Here you will find the story of a man and his courage—a woman and her sacrifice—a courtesan and her treachery—a spy and his intrigue—a little child and his inspiration—and on and on for 200 stories—2000 pages—of life and death.

The Wine of Eager Life

For most of us duty lies here, far from the places where men live whole lives in a day. But in these volumes is your chance to get away from bread and butter every day and drink the wine of eager life that these men and women pour forth before you.

For in these pages the doers, the fighters, the workers of this war take you by the hand and lead you through trench and hospital, under the sea and through the air to some thrilling story of a human heart and soul. These 200 tales of valor, daring and beauty promise that

IN THE ORCHARD

By Margaret E. Sangster

Johnny shook the apple tree,
In the orchard growing;
Shook the gnarled old apple tree
That was showing
Crimson fruit on every limb...

All at once I screamed at him,
"Johnny look-oh, look!" I cried.-
For they fell on every side,
Tiny men, with bearded faces,
Shaken rudely from their places;
Tiny men from elf-land bowers,
Scarcely larger than the flowers

That bloomed faintly in the grass.

I had often heard them pass
In the twilight, when the breeze
Whispered softly to the trees.-
I had heard them when the rain
Beat against the window pane;
And when ripples broke the still
Of the pond behind the mill,
I had heard them leaping, splashing,
I had heard them in the dashings
Of the cream when mother churned...
Sometimes when the fire burned,

I could hear them choke and sputter,
Cough and sneeze, and wheeze, and mutter!

I had heard them everywhere,
On the ground and in the air;
But although I searched I never Saw them (they were very clever)
And they always kept from me.
Till we found the apple tree,
With the crimson fruit that glowing Tempted us... when all unknowing
Johnny shook them from their places,
With annoyance on their faces!

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

Part of the measure of defeat Austrian prisoners taken by the victorious Italians

© Underwood & Underwood

Italy Turns Austrian Defeat to Rout

THE enemy, who with furious impetuosity used all means to penetrate our territory, has been repulsed at all points. His losses are very heavy. His pride is broken. Glory to all commands of soldiers, of sailors! New trials which undoubtedly await us will again show the enemy that Italy has lost none of her faith, strength and abnegation. For Italy, for King, for civilization, let us persevere in our sacred duty." Thus Gen. Diaz, in his order of the day of June 25, announced to all his armies the overwhelming defeat of the Austrians, who, on June 15, set out to crush his Italian army.

On June 22, Premier Orlando had been able to announce in Rome that the battle had been won by the Italians. On the same evening the Austrians began their retreat across the still swollen Piave. At every point at which they had crossed they began the hurried withdrawal of their troops. The early morning revealed their plans to the watchful Allied aviators, and the Italian army immediately attacked from Montello to the sea, while every bridge and every ford became the target of hundreds of Italian guns and scores of Allied bombing planes.

The retreat, begun in haste, but in order, soon became a disorderly rout in which men, material and equipment of every kind were sacrificed by some of the fleeing troops although desperate rearguard actions were fought by many detachments. Some of the troops covering the withdrawal were practically annihilated before the Italians overwhelmed and captured them. But the Italians would not be denied their victory over the invaders of their land.

On Sunday, June 23, the remaining Austrian troops on the heights of the Montello were swept into the river or captured. Immediately the Italians began a movement southward to clear the whole west bank of the disordered enemy. The marshy ground and innumerable inlets gave every facility for defense.

On the morning of June 26 not an Austrian soldier, except dead or prisoners, remained on the western shore of the Piave, except near the sea, where the Italians, holding Capo Sile in the old channel, were gradually driving the Austrians back toward the present course of the stream. Austria had not only lost footings obtained in the first day's battle, but had lost as well her bridgeheads at Zenson and below San Dona di Piave, which she had held, although under constant Italian pressure, since the Piave line was reached in the battles of last fall. Not only had the Austrians been driven from the western bank, but in the center the Italians had followed them across the river, the Italian cavalry harassing the retreat, while infantry followed hard on the heels of the mounted troops.

ON June 26 the river, which had fallen slightly on the 22d, was again in full flood, making hazardous any attempts of the Italians to follow the Austrians in large force. Aviators reported the Austrians as working desperately to move out of danger thousands of big guns which they had concentrated on the eastern bank of the Piave, at the beginning of the drive. With the Austrians still in strong force on the Asiago plateau northwest of Montello it did not seem probable that the Italians would risk a very great advance eastward, unless the enemy were totally demoralized. On June 25 the Italians, with their British and French Allies, took the offensive on the mountain front, making measurable advances and capturing prisoners, the principal advance being made northwest of Monte Grappa. The Austrians reported the Italian attacks on the Col del Rosso Monte di Val Bella, Monte Assalon and Monte Pertica as having been repulsed. (These heights were in or near the Allied forward positions when the Austrian drive began on June 15.)

While it is impossible at this writing to give more than estimates of the losses on both sides, it appears probable that the Austrian loss in killed and wounded is between 130,000 and 180,000 men, while the Italians and their Allies have captured in the neighborhood of 20,000. Vienna estimated the Italian losses at 150,000 men, including 50,000 prisoners. The Italian government declared the total losses within the 50,000 mark. The Italians, though at a disadvantage both in numbers of men and in guns, completely outfought the enemy during the eight days of the battle, the Bersaglieri especially distinguishing themselves, several units not only stopping superior Austrian organizations, but by whirlwind attacks driving them back, and cutting them to pieces. The Italians kept the Austrians under constant attack, giving them no rest, no opportunity to reform their shattered units and no time to replace worn troops with fresh. In driving back the invaders across the river, the Italians retook all of their own artillery lost to the Austrians since the 15th and also captured large numbers of Austrian guns and much material.

JUNE 24 was the anniversary of the great Italian victories of Solferino and San Martino. Once more France and Italy were allies against Austria, once more Austria had met defeat, but on this anniversary Britain and America were allied with the Latin troops against the Teutons. The Austrian drive, instituted with true Teutonic thoroughness, even to the visit of the Emperor to the battle ground, initiated apparently in the hope of drawing Italian troops from the front in France, and even in case of marked success of forcing Gen. Foch to send French, British and American reinforcements, not only failed to draw a single soldier from the western front but German troops attacking on June 22 at Mont Bligny, south of Rheims, were driven back by Italian troops after having gained a foothold on the mount. Not satisfied with one rebuff, the Germans came back again at Bligny on the following day, being completely repulsed by the Italians.

WHAT is it that we get from Ocean Grove that allures the worshiping multitudes to the dear old-fashioned camping-ground every summer?" is a question I have often asked myself. It is one which has probably been asked by thousands of others who go year after year, until the annual sojourn there has become a fixed habit. And I believe I have found out, this season, just what is the subtle influence that draws the host of many denominations to the place which has become something of a Mecca to those who have grown jaded by the world's cares and resort to the homey place and find its saline atmosphere, its bright sunshine and its ocean lullaby restful and reviving.

But the gift of the Grove to those who love it most is not an atmospheric one. I have talked with many of the older habitués, and this is what they tell me: "What we get from Ocean Grove is what we take. Holiness, purity and Christlikeness are there. In the restless ocean we may see God's greatness and gain his rest in communion with nature. We find in the social and spiritual life of the Grove the truth emphasized that God's people are a joyful people, and that joy is the true keynote of the Christian religion. Out of such a gathering of earnest souls there ought to come increased vigor and aggressiveness to the Christian Church throughout this land of freedom."

THIS I take to be a fair expression of the prevailing sentiment at Ocean Grove. Perhaps I might add to joy, confidence in and firm dependence upon God's providence. The submarine menace along the coast does not seem to affect the place, for the people are arriving daily in larger numbers than ever before. The Atlantic laps the shore as peacefully as though no intruder could come near. God's boundless love and the wideness of his mercy enwrap the consecrated ground and manifestations of his glory are heard in the songs and the sermons, while the Bible study and the testimonies to the operation of divine power are still heard on the old camp ground. Moreover, the Gospel that is taught there is one that is so broad and generous that it is acceptable in the main to believers of every creed.

And there are many familiar faces which we recognize as belonging to the old brigade. James William Marshall, D.D., the District Superintendent, and now Vice President of the Association, has charge of the platform services in the great auditorium, and of the Holiness meeting—where he is assisted by Rev. Dr. Wheeler—and also the Beach meetings on Sunday evenings at 6 o'clock. Preaching services began

He, too, has gone to France, on a special mission for the Young Men's Christian Association, and will not return until the autumn.

THE program of Sunday and weekly services at the Grove this season contains many names of well-known preachers, including Revs. Nehemiah Boynton, Edwin F. Hann, S. Parkes Cadman, Samuel McWilliams, Dr. David J. Burrell, Bishop E. H. Hughes, Bishop I. Breyfogel of Reading, Pa., Rev. Cortland Myers of Boston, W. R. Wedderspoon of Chicago, and others. Statesmen, reformers and other leaders in thought and action will be there to address the multitudes during the summer, and there will be strong attractions, both spectacular and musical.

Of course, the annual Camp Meeting, which this

The birth of Ocean Grove was due largely to the Holiness movement. It was organized by a few faithful believers, including Alfred Cookman, William Osborne, John Inskip, Dr. Stokes, Rufus Lawrence, and Dr. A. E. Ballard. The last named is now the only survivor of this consecrated band. He has always stood firm in his decision to keep Ocean Grove a place for Christian worship and fellowship, excluding all traffic on Sundays. He fought earnestly and successfully to keep the Grove a borough. If the men who founded it could speak today, they would say: "In the beginning—God." This tells the secret of its success, which started a new epoch in simple Christian living. In vision they saw a great movement—not of man, but God—gathering into its embrace all true-hearted Christians; a united association, worthy of the indwelling of Jesus Christ among men, which would bring holiness and power to his followers. It would almost seem as if, at the Grove, John Wesley's last message to the world is still echoing: "The best of all: God is with us!"

IT would almost seem from the program as though every conceivable variety of religious activity had been included this year. There are meetings of the Home and Foreign missionary societies, Rescue Missions for women, Temperance organizations, Sunshine Society meetings, Musical recitals and concerts at which the gatherings will listen to such celebrities as Mme. Schumann-Heink; Max Rosen, violinist; Lucy Gates, soprano; Mischa Elman, violinist; John McCormack, the brilliant tenor; Eugen Ysaye, violinist; and Galli Curci, soprano. Altogether, those features of the Grove that appeal

Messing With the Boys at Camp Dix

By
PHILIP I. ROBERTS

MY early years were passed in a great English military center—a place where hundreds of British Tommies were always quartered; where parades, reviews, officers' balls, soldiers' funerals, the arrival and departure of troops, and all the other stirring scenes of barrack-town life, were events of daily occurrence. This was away back in the eighties of last century. Down to Friday, June 21, not once, in all the intervening years, had it fallen to my lot to be where any considerable number of fighting men were mobilized.

On that day I enjoyed the privilege of making one of a party of magazine and newspaper writers who, as guests of the National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A., spent a long and hugely enjoyable day at Camp Dix. To every member of that party this tour of inspection proved a positive revelation. We saw the young American soldier at work and at play. There was borne in upon us as perhaps never before what had been done for him; what was being done for him; what was going to be done for him; what, moreover, he was doing for himself. And with and through it all came an intensified realization of what he was doing and going to do for us, for his home, his country and the cause of freedom throughout the world.

SO far as my own personal surmises and expectations went, scarcely a thing in the whole cantonment turned out to be as I had imagined or anticipated it. I had thought of congested areas—wooden structures and dog-tents crowded together, with scarcely a hand-span between them. What I found was a huge reservation of some 12,000 acres, intersected by broad thoroughfares and holding great open spaces—a cantonment miles and miles across, where the bracing winds blow lustily, wherein some old farmsteads still stand, pastoral reminders of what the whole countryside must have been in ante-bellum days. Again and again I had heard of the Y. M. C. A. "huts," and imagined them as being little, two-by-four sort of places into which men crowded pell-mell under uncomfortable if not unsanitary conditions. These same "huts" turned out to be well-constructed roomy buildings, twelve in number, with plenty of air-space and elbow room, and, as evening drew on, "something doing" in them all.

Of course, the universal introduction of khaki, both in America and Britain, had long ago helped even so unmilitary a person as myself to realize that the day of uselessly ornate uniforms (so far as the armies of these countries were concerned) had gone never to return. Yet such were the associations of my boyhood, that the recollection of them almost always conjures up scenes in which scarlet and gold, blue and silver, bear-skin helmet and shining cuirass, the pomp and circumstance of war, plays a large and gorgeous part. But of all this there was not a trace at Camp Dix. Here was an army of nearly forty thousand men. So far as mere clothes went, one might have been in some mammoth camp of mining engineers. Everybody and everything I saw—from the gracious, urbane general commanding to the newly arrived negro labor-battalion, from the motor-ambulances in which our party were conveyed about the cantonment to the metal drinking-cups and cunningly-devised food-platters we used at mess was to me, at any rate, unusual, modern, completely superseding the archaic, erroneously held impressions of a lifetime. One thing, and one only, seemed not to have altered, or disappeared. There he was, to be numbered by the score, just as tireless, just as ubiquitous, just as indispensable, and, I make no doubt, just as stubborn as ever—the good old army mule!

HAVING lunched with Major-General Scott and his staff, our party commenced its tour of inspection by visiting the Camp Bakery. Everything about it was as clean as a new whistle. Any who felt it laid upon themselves to keep their eyes "peeled" and their noses well down on the trail of uncleanness or unsanitary conditions, searched and smelt in vain. Ovens, mixing apparatus, utensils of every kind, were alike beyond reproach. The Bakery's daily capacity is 40,000 pounds. Ranged on tier above tier, crisp-looking and invitingly browned, were 20,000 two-pound loaves, and all white bread! I saw more of this delectable commodity in five minutes than I have seen in New York in six months—more, probably, than I shall see again until after the termination of the war. I eat in restaurants of varying sorts; and on many a morning have I broken apart my breakfast roll, only to find it looking like concrete, and tasting almost as appetizing. But I do not believe I shall ever grumble again. This glorious white bread—it was glorious and I ate my fill of it, for one day at least—was being fed to our gallant soldier boys, for which fact I thanked God and the military authori-genuinely hungry and fatigued after a dusty hike to the rifle-range, or long hours spent on the parade ground. After mess, several of the men sang popular songs to a piano accompaniment. One young fellow had an especially fine voice, quite good enough to hear anywhere.

I talked with many of the men, and found them, without exception, keen on becoming efficient soldiers, reasonably contented, and with their minds on their job. During the closing hours of our stay in the camp, rain, which had held off all day, began to fall. This, however, did not deter a great throng from gathering for the open-air Y. M. C. A. "sing" and entertainment. Led by Mr. Chrystal Brown, the boys whistled and sang with real heartiness and enjoyment for more than an hour, after which a company of entertainers from New York did their various "stunts," in the rain, and everybody stayed it out to the finish. Of course, nobody expected American soldiers, fit as a fiddle and hard as nails, to do anything else, and nobody was disappointed.

THE shades of evening now began to gather over the cantonment, and the rain to fall heavier. Once more boarding our motor-ambulances, we took short peeps into the various "Y" huts, where other entertainments were in progress. Each one we visited was crowded to the doors with men who, beyond all doubt, keenly appreciate the splendid efforts of those who are striving not only to provide amusement, instruction and relaxation, and keep men engaged and contented in their "play-hours," but to stave off the attacks of homesickness from boys of sensitive temperament, away from the old roof-tree for the first time in their lives.

Wrestling, minstrelsy, and other diversions planned and organized by the War Work Council were being hugely enjoyed and uproariously applauded, as we rapidly passed from one hut to another.

Our day at Camp Dix had now reached its close. A run of twenty miles, made in automobiles, brought us to Trenton, there to catch the Pennsylvania express to New York. We had spent a wonderful day—a day in which much hitherto hidden had been revealed, a day which sent at least one man home saying repeatedly to himself: "I know now, if never before, who is going to prove the deciding factor in this great world war."

No soldiers of any army in the world are being fed as the boys are being fed at Camp Dix. And what is being done here is, I presume, being done in all the other cantonments throughout the country. No army, in this fourth year of the titanic struggle, has such young, vigorous material to draw upon. None possesses finer morale; and none is having its highest moral welfare more zealously looked after. To this latter-duty the men of the Red Triangle have quietly and unostentatiously addressed themselves with assiduity and success.

YES; it was a wonderful day—one not easily, if ever, to be forgotten. Mr. A. B. Elliott of the War Work Council looked after the comfort of his guests untiringly. The officers of the camp, senior and junior alike, were affable, approachable, eager to impart information, ready to serve. I met no "grouch" anywhere—the whole division seemed to be, as I am quite sure it was, permeated by the finest esprit de corps.

All the Y. M. C. A. workers I met and talked with at Camp Dix were just "reg'lar fellers," all quite obviously actuated by a desire to help these boys—called from home and civilian pursuits to don the khaki of soldiers of the Republic—to lead a straight life, a clean life, a life worthy of the best traditions of American manhood: "to endure hardness as a good soldier," and to furnish an added incentive for conquering tyranny.

ties. These boys deserve the best, and depend upon it, they are getting it—at Camp Dix.

The Base Hospital was next visited, and found to be a splendidly equipped institution. It has a capacity for 2,000 patients, whose needs and ailments are cared for by a fully adequate staff of competent medical men and trained nurses. I saw nothing crude or makeshift anywhere. The wards, corridors and convalescent rooms were scrupulously clean and well-appointed. Lieutenant-Colonel White, chief of staff to Major-General Hugh Scott, who accompanied the party on its tour of inspection, stated that more than 100,000 men had passed through the camp since its establishment, and 12,000 cases of all sorts had received hospital treatment. Of this number, only one hundred and fifty-two had died—a percentage which needs no comment, speaking as it does for itself as to the high efficiency attained by the Base Hospital at Camp Dix.

THE remainder of the afternoon was spent in viewing the trench area (the whole party filing through communicating trenches into the front-line "ditches," the more venturesome creeping into the dug-outs), the rifle-range, the comfortable Hostess House of the Y. W. C. A., the new Convalescent House erected by the Red Cross, and in watching a review of the third battalion of the 347th Infantry on the great central parade ground. This review was participated in by four maneuvering companies of two hundred and fifty men each.

Then came mess with the men of Companies 1, 2, 3 and 4, First Battalion, 153d Depot Brigade. This, possibly, was the most enjoyable feature of the whole trip. We sat among the boys, ate the same "grub," used the same table "tools" and utensils (these latter a little difficult for mere civilians to manipulate) and altogether spent a most agreeable time. The food was excellent. Pot-roast, juicy and well-cooked, stewed corn, mashed potatoes, steaming hot cocoa and white bread—what more would you? And the boys were allowed second helpings, which is a fine, sensible arrangement, mind you, when young manhood is

A LETTER to the Christian Herald from Mrs. Bertha Vester of the American Colony, dated Jerusalem, April 27, tells of the great relief work now going on there. She writes: "We owe you many apologies for not having written you before about your interests, but I am sure you will condone the seeming neglect when you learn how busy we have been, since God sent us release and deliverance through the gallant British troops; for the people were reduced to the lowest possible depths from want of food and clothes, and through sickness and disease. So it was that the Unified American and British Syria and Palestine Relief Fund began by opening a clinic and employing, first one and now two doctors and a dispenser, where the poor can be attended to or be visited and have the needed care.

"Then followed the gathering from the streets of the numerous children who had lost their parents and were uncared for—over 500 such have been housed in four different orphanages where they are fed and clothed. Then, as soon as the military found it possible to grant transportation, foodstuffs and cloth were brought from Egypt and work-rooms containing 450 women were opened.

"About 12,000 garments have thus far been made for the poor and the orphanages, and meanwhile these women earn their living making the garments and benefit by this relief. A soup kitchen has also been started, where destitute Christians can get the food they need. Here 5,000 get soup daily. Then domiciliary visits are made to every section of the city. Seventeen of our people are devoting their entire time to these various charities.

"Over a thousand sacks of rice, having been brought in by the Fund, the price of this staple article dropped from 55 piasters the rotte to 10, all the population benefiting thereby. In the same way, a large consignment of canned milk has brought immediate help.

"We began to restart the lace industry, though much havoc had been played with the workers during the interval (when it was suspended), many having died, while others had sold everything and did not have a home where they could do the work. We have started two classes of twenty-five each, where we are teaching the making of the lace, enabling the young girls to earn a living and keeping them off the street. We have also been giving lace work to 106 women.

"Mr. Trowbridge, who represents the Red Cross here, received the $11,000 the Christian Herald so liberally sent for industrial purposes to aid in the relief. ($10,000 was sent for the work of the American Colony and $1,000 for the Samaritans.) He has advanced us a good part of it, and we have now rented part of a building close by, where the classes will be increased to four instead of two, and where we shall be able to considerably enlarge and extend our activities. We feel so grateful to your readers for this.

"We also learn from the Red Cross people that about fifty of their number are soon coming to Jerusalem, among them Mr. Waters of your staff, and we rejoice in this, for he will be able to let you know what is taking place here, and we can consult with him as to what we should do to further your plans.

"You will be pleased to know that the first newspaper we received (after the Turkish capitulation) addressed to us was the Christian Herald. You can hardly imagine the joy it was to see the old familiar cover, and to feel we were again in touch with the home country and our friends. When I have time I shall write to you of our wonderful deliverances. It will sound like the Bible experiences over again."

IN a letter from Jerusalem, dated April 5, to Secretary C. V. Vickrey of the Armenian and Syrian Committee in New York, Rev. Stephen Trowbridge reports a meeting of the Relief Fund Central Committee. The following passages occur in the minutes:

Voted that, inasmuch as the sum of $10,000 has been sent by the Christian Herald of New York through our treasury to the American Colony for the encouragement of the lace industry, we cooperate in every possible way with the American Colony in the securing of supplies and the forwarding of this industry as a Relief Measure, leaving the matters of management and sales of the product in their hands, to be dealt with according to their agreements with the Christian Herald. [According to arrangement the result of all sales is to be returned by the Christian Herald to the American Colony, to be expended in further production.]

Voted that we ask Mrs. Vester to investigate the possibilities of organizing industrial work among the women at Ramallah and Bethlehem.

Voted that Mrs. Vester and Messrs. Reynolds and Cleland be a committee to inquire as to the possibility of using the equipment of Pastor Schneller's school and the securing of a staff for industrial work for men and boys.

Voted that we express to the American Colony our most sincere appreciation of the generous assistance being rendered the Fund by them, in the setting aside of fifteen of their members to devote practically all of their time to Relief work; and further that we express our readiness to assist the Colony in every way possible to obtain necessary supplies for their own use.

WITH victory slipping through Germany's fingers in the west, and Austria overwhelmed in defeat in Italy, it was to be expected that some talk of peace would arise in Berlin. But it came, much to the distaste of the Junkers, in an address of Dr. Richard von Kühlmann, Minister of Foreign Affairs, in the Reichstag, on June 25, in which was envisaged no peace with victory, but a negotiated peace. Dr. von Kühlmann, after declaring that Germany before the war was realizing her essential aims by peaceful negotiation, after disclaiming any intent on the part of Germany to seek world dominion, and after shifting the primary blame of instigating the war from England to Russia, said:

"In view of the magnitude of this war and the number of powers, including those from overseas, that are engaged, its end can hardly be expected through purely military decisions alone and without recourse to diplomatic negotiations. . . .

"I consider it necessary to say quite simply, and in a way easy for all to understand, what our positive desires are. We wish for the German people and our allies a free, strong, independent existence within the boundaries drawn for us by history. We desire overseas possessions corresponding to our greatness and wealth; the freedom of the sea, carrying our trade to all parts of the world."

Setting the Stage for a New Drive

In regard to Belgium, he said: "We must decline to make, as it were, a prior concession by giving a statement on the Belgian question which would bind us, without in the least binding the enemy."

Following Dr. von Kühlmann's speech, the Imperial Chancellor, Count von Hertling, addressed the Reichstag.

"I said on February 24 that the four points of President Wilson," the Chancellor asserted, "might possibly form the basis of a general world peace. No utterance of President Wilson whatever followed this, so that there is no object in spinning any further the threads there started."

As the significance of von Kühlmann's speech dawned upon them, the Junkers and their press became more enraged, being particularly disturbed by the partial absolution of England from the guilt so assiduously imputed to her since 1914 by the German war party. The speech did not impress either Paris, London, or Washington as in any way an approach to peace, although it might foreshadow a peace offensive.

As if in answer to von Kühlmann's apparent lack of faith in victory, June 27th saw reports, vague hitherto, of German preparations for a final drive, culminating in stories of prisoners, taken at varying points of the front, who all agreed that according to Germany's rather boastful program, July would see Rheims taken from the French, and that in August the grand offensive would take Paris, destroy the British, French and American armies and force a German peace upon the world.

The Rout of the Austrians

THE Italian victory on the Piave is not only heartening to the morale of the Allies but is a decided gain. It is a gain of much important strategic territory and is a stunning defeat to the Austrians just at the psychological moment when Austria can least bear reverses.

Austria has two pressing and relentless enemies—hunger at home and the Italians at the front. On both sides her situation has suddenly become acutely hopeless. With never much heart in the war, with little to gain from it at best, and with the Hohenzollern yoke settling more securely upon her neck, Austria has had little stimulus for the fight, and now has less than ever.

Driven back across the Piave with tremendous losses of men and material and hotly pressed beyond, held in the Alps by heavy concentrations of artillery and threatened with a new Italian drive in the north, the Austrian army is on the run, leaving behind at least 200,000 dead and captured.

As the tide of the battle has turned in Italy, also it seems to have turned in no small degree in France. Everywhere the enemy is being held or driven back. American power is asserting itself on the Western front, forming an insuperable barrier to further enemy advance, and now our boys are arriving on the battle lines of Italy, there to help carry the splendid victory further still.

Not the least of Austria's troubles lies in the defection of her Czecho-Slovaks. In the midst of her other reverses, this is emphasized by the arrival in France of thousands of Czechs and Slovaks, who have journeyed almost around the world to fight against her. To the number of 150,000 they made themselves felt in the armies of Russia and will be felt again in France and Italy.

The Austrian defeat, with all that goes with it, is one of the most important if not decisive military events of the whole war.

Prayer Bells

IN the town of Verbena, Ala., every afternoon at six o'clock, the church bells ring for prayer. Then the Verbena people, with heads uncovered and bowed, repeat these words: "God bless our President, our soldiers, our Nation, and guide them to victory." When the bells begin to ring, men halt in the streets, wagons stop, women cease work, and all pray. People who have never prayed before pray now. In Middletown, Delaware, and in many other villages of the State, all the church bells ring for a few moments at the noonday hour, and the people stop wherever they are and pray for the triumph of the Allies.

Are not prayer bells ringing everywhere in America today, calling us to more vital union with Almighty God through the medium of prayer—prayer of the East and prayer of the West, of the North and of the South in one united voice ascending to heaven for the help of Almighty God to lead our army in this our struggle for world-liberty? May our own Revolutionary Liberty Bell once more peal forth the music of freedom in our Independence Hall, proclaiming the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. All the bells of the nation should join in the chorus, with the old sacred Liberty Bell, for universal justice and truth to prevail over all peoples, that the rights of the weaker nations may be preserved inviolate from tyrannical aggression.

Idealism in the War

VISCOUNT GREY, the British ex-Secretary of Foreign Affairs, has been drawn into the ranks of the pamphleteers, and his printed discussion of "The Conflict for Human Liberty" is his latest contribution to the history of the Great War. Our entrance into the struggle he regards as one of the great events that are "full of hope and ultimate good prospect." He recognizes the fact that this country, at the time of its entry, was unprepared, and therefore its intervention could not become decisive in a short time; but he holds that no conceivable military or naval success of the German armies can now secure a German peace. Germany cannot get peace and the economic recovery which she, at least as much as the other great European belligerents, needs, except on the conditions that the United States may consider essential to their own interests and to the future peace and freedom of the world. It is impossible to get round this fact, and it is not surprising that Germany dare not face it, and turns her back upon it that she may not face it, for that is what the organized silence and contempt in Germany of the action of the United States really mean.

But above and beyond these considerations, he regards as of deeper significance and more far-reaching consequence the reasons and spirit of the decision taken by the President and the nation. Our departure from the policy of isolation, he points out, is not from favor to one set of combatants against another, but from conviction that the war is a critical struggle against something that is evil and "intensely dangerous to moral law, to international good faith, to everything that is essential, if different nations are to live together in the world in equal freedom and friendship." Militarism, he points out, stands for things that all democracies, if they wish to remain free and be part of a world that is free, must hate. He finds, therefore, that the real reason of America's action is that old barriers are broken down, that the cause of humanity is one, and "that no nation so great and free as the United States could stand aside in this crisis without sacrificing its honor and losing its soul!"

Viscount Grey's conclusions run on lines that are notably parallel with those expressed by President Wilson in his published addresses on various occasions within the last year. He sees a great weariness and longing for the end of the war, but an intense desire to see it end in such a way that human liberty and peace may be assured. He then discusses permanent peace as an ideal, and asks whether a League of Nations, or some such plan, will be practicable—in other words, can the ideal be brought within the range of practical, effective world politics? This is a question which can only be answered by experience, and he personally hopes and believes that it will be answered affirmatively. There will be a new order of things with the coming of peace, and the permanency of the ideal will depend upon the change effected by the war in the hearts and feelings of men, rather than in their heads.

To make peace on the hope that the disappointment and war-weariness of the German people would bring about a real change of power in that nation, the Viscount believes would be gambling upon a chance, with things at stake too vital and awful for the risk. He heartily endorses President Wilson's view that a steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations, and that no autocratic government could be trusted to keep faith within it, or observe its covenants. Germany must first fulfil the conditions before it can be admitted to such a partnership, and until these conditions are fulfilled "the war is and will remain, on the part of the United States and the Allies, a defensive war—a war to defend human liberty and free nations from present and future military aggression." He closes with the expression of the hope that out of Prussian defeat there "must come something constructive, some moral change in international relations; and the entry of the United States into the war, in the spirit and with the principles that inspired their action, is an invaluable, sure and unconquerable guarantee that, in the peace and after the peace, these hopes will be realized."

The Food Situation

IN a timely report on food conditions and the outlook, the New York State Food Supply Commission sets forth some very practical suggestions which are applicable to every section of the country. With the continuance of the war, the food situation is bound to become an increasingly difficult problem, and one which must be solved largely by the farmers of America. Even were the war to end this year, the needs of the Allies will continue to tax us heavily for another year at least. Crops in all the combatant countries will be wholly inadequate to supply even the lowest normal needs of their populations. Meanwhile, with actual famine prevailing in Austria and large areas of Russia; with Germany practically on half-rations and facing "meatless weeks"; with labor strikes increasing everywhere abroad owing to the food shortage, and with a widespread fuel famine impending in nearly all the European states, it is a wise policy for our own people to be conservative in their consumption, especially of those food products that will be imperatively needed elsewhere, if worse disaster is to be averted.

Fortunately we are still able to supply from our abundance the needs of a large part of Europe, and will continue to do so if the present favorable crop prospects come to realization. Our Federal and State governments are extending liberal aid to the farmers, both in credit and labor. Production of essential foods is everywhere being stimulated. The farmer is the leading factor in the situation, and upon him, more largely than upon any other class, depends the winning of the war. All the States are now taking stock of their food and fuel resources, and making a serious study of production and conservation. A systematic effort is being made to supply the shortage of agricultural help. Food profiteering is quickly detected and sharply punished. Of coal we shall have enough to fight on, and unless production is largely increased we shall burn our fuel next winter as we eat our bread—on a war basis—eking it out with wood. We can face the situation with a courage and determination to surmount whatever difficulties may arise, and all this and even more we shall do gladly and patriotically to help win the war.

We Can No Longer Send the Christian Herald to Those Whose Subscriptions Are Not Paid in Advance

REGULATIONS will shortly be made by the Federal Trade Commission to conserve the supply of paper used by magazines. The draft law has taken many men from the paper mills. There is also a shortage of the raw materials from which paper is made. Transportation facilities are taxed to the utmost. For this reason, publishers of magazines, including the Christian Herald, will not be able to obtain as great a supply of paper as formerly. The forthcoming regulations of the Federal Trade Commission will make it obligatory for publishers to entirely eliminate from their subscriptions lists all but those whose subscriptions are strictly paid in advance. All free and sample copies will be eliminated.

We have always been glad to grant our readers a reasonable latitude in sending in their renewals, realizing that there were many who might not always find it convenient to pay promptly at the date when the subscription expired. We can no longer continue this custom, but will be compelled to drop from our list all whose subscriptions are not paid in advance. We have no option in the matter. The new regulations are a war-time measure. We feel sure that our readers will see the justice of this new arrangement, and will renew their subscriptions promptly at the date of expiration, or before. Do not wait until your subscription is about to expire. It takes us about three weeks to replace a name on our list. If you overlook renewing your subscription promptly, you will miss several issues of the Christian Herald, and it will be impossible for us to duplicate these missing issues, as we will be able to print only the exact number of copies to be sent to our paid-in-advance subscribers.

Furthermore, as the new regulations will affect the publication of books as well as periodicals, we would advise our readers to take time by the forelock during the short period remaining, and make their purchases of any books on the Christian Herald's list of book offers, which they may wish to buy. This will forestall disappointment.

Now, please remember: These new regulations may be enforced with any issue. If your subscription is in arrears, send in your renewal at once.

The Jewish Restoration

IT is a hopeful sign to note the various Zionist organizations coming into closer relationship, with the view of rendering effective united service looking to the rehabilitation of Palestine. At an important convention held in Pittsburg lately, the proposition for a union of organizations was strongly urged, that they might establish definite contact with the work now going on in the Holy Land. It is not merely relief and rehabilitation work that is needed, for there are larger problems that have come up with the larger outlook. Half a year has changed the whole aspect of affairs. The time is near at hand when the Zionists of America must be prepared to take an active and important part in the work of restoration, and this they can only do if all factional interests are put aside in the interest of Jewish unification. While the war lasts, there will, of necessity, be need for benevolent effort on a large scale—more needed possibly than at the present time, for war breeds cumulative suffering. But in the alignment of Jewish forces for the greater problem ahead—which is to plan for the future welfare and development of the land that is dearer than all else to the Jew—men of broad vision and statesmanlike qualities will be needed. Such men will be welcomed in the councils of those nations who are the friends of Israel, and who believe that the future is bright with promise for the chosen people, not only in their own land but throughout the world.

Is the Kaiser the Antichrist?

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I

AMONG the many questions in the realm of prophecy which have arisen during the war, the two most persistent have been, "Is this the battle of Armageddon?" and "Is the Kaiser the Antichrist?" The first was answered in the negative some time ago, giving the Bible reasons for our faith, and the second we consider in this article.

Two or three months ago occasion was had to correspond with several Bible teachers who are authorities in prophetic study, when the question of the Kaiser's being the Antichrist was taken up. The letters were so interesting and informing that permission was obtained to publish some of them.

The first is from the Rev. I. M. Haldeman, D.D., known to Christian Herald readers as the able pastor of the First Baptist Church, Seventy-ninth Street and Broadway, New York City, who writes:

"There are many things in the career, attitude and speech of the Kaiser, together with his victorious march to the East, which suggest the Antichrist. Should he succeed as he is now endeavoring to do in raising an army of a million or two of Asiatics; should he take possession of Persia, Armenia and the Euphratean valley; set up a kingdom from Bagdad to Babylon; assume the titles of the Chaldean, the Assyrian and king of Babylon; win Jerusalem from the English and then announce himself protector of the Jews; declare the restoration of the Holy Roman Empire or the Germano-Roman Empire as he has promised to do, with greater extension and glory than it ever knew, he would almost line for line be fulfilling the portrait of the Wicked One.

"But we must measure final things by the image. The image has a twofold process of fulfilment; from the head to the feet—from the feet to the head. So far it has been going down from the head to the feet. We are undoubtedly in the region or the beginning of the region of the clay. The Antichrist can come only when the prophecy starts backward or upward from the feet to the head. As the clay is the basic element (and that is the people), then the iron (the autocratic) element can come in only after the clay has come to the front.

"The federation of ten kings comes not from war as such, nor as the result of a conqueror's victory, but by and from the people, who must produce the democratic kings. The last Kaiser can become such only after five democratic kings come in the region of the Western Empire and five in the Eastern (starting from the Adriatic line and below the Danube).

"The initial act of the Antichrist which throws him forward to Europe is the overthrow of three democratic and eastern systems. He becomes the wild beast of whom the question is asked, 'Who is able to make war with him?' only after he has become the head of the image. Then the question must further arise: 'Against whom does he make war?' Evidently not against his own ten kings. This being so would eliminate him as a personal or possible factor in this war, and necessarily free the present Kaiser from identification with him.

"Bacon says prophecy has a budding, a blossoming and a fulfilling. I am assured we are largely in the blossoming, and every day's event gives emphasis to the fulfilment of prophecy and the verification of the written Word, but the Kaiser is not the Antichrist."

SOME of our readers may welcome a few words of explanation of the above. Dr. Haldeman's reference to the "image" means that which Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, saw in his dream as recorded and interpreted in Daniel 2. It revealed the whole course of Gentile history in the world from that day till the end of this age. The ten toes of the image are having their historical fulfilment now, in Dr. Haldeman's judgment. They were composed part of iron and part of clay, the latter representing democracy, the former autocracy. Democracy is coming into the ascendant at the present time, but there will be a reaction, as he understands the prophecy, and from the people themselves will arise the autocratic despot, the Antichrist. This will not be, however, until the ten "democratic kings," or kingdoms, are clearly defined, and divided evenly between the eastern and western halves of the old Roman Empire. When the Antichrist arises, his appearance will be coincident with his overthrow of three of the eastern kingdoms, after which the growth of his power will be rapid until he is at the head of the ten, the head of the image and the successor of Nebuchadnezzar. He then goes forth to "make war"; but as it is obvious that he does not make war against his own under kings, or his own kingdoms, he can not be the Kaiser, because the latter is at present making war against some or most of those very kingdoms at whose head the Antichrist shall be. This, as Dr. Haldeman says, does "necessarily free the present Kaiser from identification with him."

II

WE follow Dr. Haldeman's communication with that of Dr. C. I. Scofield, because he also stresses the point that the political despot we have in mind comes out from among the people, the democracy. Dr. Scofield, unlike Dr. Haldeman, and some others, distinguishes between the "Beast" of Revelation 13 and the Antichrist. The "Beast," in his opinion, is the political despot, and the Antichrist the false prophet associated with him in that chapter. For our purpose, however, this distinction need not be pressed, as we are talking about the political despot himself, the wicked head of the Gentile powers at the end of the age, whether he be called for the present "Beast" or the "Antichrist."

Of him Dr. Scofield says: "The one unanswerable objection to the Kaiser-Beast theory is that the 'Beast' rises 'out of the sea,' i.e., the mere mass of men. Napoleon Bonaparte might well be taken as an adumbration. The Kaiser comes of a race of rulers, and is by no means merged in the mass of mankind.

"Another collateral argument rests upon the man of one kingdom overcoming two, over which he reigns, and then over the federated restored empire. The whole setting is of the East, and not of northern Europe.

"Moreover, the final scene brings against him in his place 'in the glorious holy mountain' powers from the North and South. If the 'Beast' is the Kaiser, his own power is in the North; therefore I do not believe the Kaiser-Beast theory."

III

MR. A. C. GAEBELEIN, editor of "Our Hope," is the next authority. He is the author of many Bible commentaries, that on Daniel probably being the best known. Like Dr. Scofield, he says: "It is very necessary to distinguish between the two leaders of the end of the age, who head the apostate forces after the true church has been caught away. The one is the head of the reconstructed Roman empire seen by Daniel as the little horn among the ten horns (7) and as the prince in the ninth chapter; the other is the personal Antichrist, whose picture is given in the eleventh chapter. The one is the political masterpiece of Satan and the other the ecclesiastical head.

"The head of the Roman empire (the political masterpiece) must appear first, but he cannot appear till that empire is formed. The final Antichrist, who denies the Father and the Son, who does away with all Christian doctrine and opposeth and exalteth himself, etc., cannot come till the apostasy is here. The apostasy in turn cannot come as long as the true Church is in earth.

"To restate: The emperor over the Roman empire will not appear till that empire is formed. The personal Antichrist will be manifested when the apostasy has come. Inasmuch, then, as we have no Roman empire revived and the apostasy is not here, and above all, the true Church is still on earth and the Body of Christ still forming, the two persons are not in power."

IV

THE following from the pen of W. J. Erdman, D.D., of Germantown, Pa., is very clear. He is one of the last representatives of that distinguished company of Bible expounders among whom the late Dr. James H. Brookes was a leader, and which included Bishop William R. Nicholson and President W. G. Moorehead, Professors Kellogg and Stiller, Doctors West, Gordon, Parsons and Pierson, and Evangelists Needham and Major Whittle. There were giants in those days, and their summer rendezvous was the Bible Conference at Niagara, of which Dr. Erdman was for years the honored and efficient secretary.

Coming to the question, "Is the Kaiser the Antichrist?" he says, "No," for the following reasons:

"1. Because the 'ten toes' or 'ten horns' do not now exist in Europe, Asia, Africa, and he rises later from among the horns and is autocrat over all.

"2. No system like the 'Woman Babylon' now exists, to be upheld by the 'beast and ten kings' for a while and then destroyed by them. Papal Rome cannot be the 'Babylon' now; the Pope, in spite of all his claims, is of small account in fact just now.

"3. But the Kaiser and the ambitions of Germany and the War do give the nations a sample of what will come in the days of the 'beast.'

"4. A season of peace will follow this war, in which the Lord will give man another trial in religion and government; but the outcome will be 'Babylon' and the 'Beast.' But I am firm in the belief that the Kaiser does not 'fill the bill' of the Antichrist, whether politically as the 'ten-horned beast,' or doctrinally as the 'two horned,' his minister and miracle-worker.

"Wilhelm II will have to be grayer than he is now to see his Antichrist's day."

WE conclude with a brief paragraph from the Rev. Robert Cameron, D.D., of Seattle, Wash., joint editor with the Rev. Mark A. Matthews, D.D., of Watchword and Truth.

"As to the Kaiser," he says, "I see no difficulty in answering that. The Antichrist will be at the head of the ten nations; his capital, or rather the center of his political movements, will be Babylon rebuilt; his religious persecutions will have their center in Jerusalem and Palestine. That is perfectly plain. Therefore, the Kaiser cannot be the Antichrist. He may be, and is doubtless, in some respects, a foreshadowing of what the Antichrist will be."

Summing up the foregoing, we find that the Kaiser is not the Antichrist for the following reasons:

1. Because the time has not arrived for the Antichrist to appear.

(a) The people, that is the democracy, are not yet in power in the eastern and western portions of the Roman empire. In other words, the renewed Roman empire is not yet formed.

(b) The apostasy has not yet come to a head.

(c) The Church has not yet been translated.

2. The Kaiser is making war against some of the very peoples who will give the power to the Antichrist, which contradicts the thought that he could be that person.

3. The Antichrist and the "Beast," if they be regarded as separate persons, arises in the East and not in northern Europe, which precludes the thought of the Kaiser being the Antichrist.

AMONG THE WORKERS

THE New York Bible Society, following its policy of placing the Word of God in the hands of every man in uniform, has twice before given an order for 100,000 "Active Service" New Testaments for presentation to the soldiers and sailors, and now it has given a third similar order, besides 300,000 Gospel portions for general distribution. These, the largest orders ever given by the society, show how great is the demand for the Bible. The Testaments containing messages from General Pershing and Colonel Roosevelt are most popular among the soldiers. The Active Service Testaments contain, in addition to the message from the commanding general, a List of Passages to be read in times of emergency and a Decision Form to be signed. They cost 20 cents each, or $20 per hundred. Among many prominent men who have praised the activities of the society, Food Administrator Hoover recently wrote: "Your plan of providing a Bible for those who face death for ideals and for country is most admirable." Ambassador James W. Gerard wrote: "The Bible is as essential to the soldier's equipment as his rifle." Secretary McAdoo says: "The Word of God should be in the heart of every soldier and sailor of America." Many other statesmen have written in praise of the work of the Society in behalf of the soldiers and sailors. The general secretary of the society is Rev. George William Carter, Ph.D., Bible House, New York City.

A BLACK arm-band, with a gold star, has been recommended by the Women's Committee of the Council of National Defense, to be worn on the left arm instead of mourning by American women who have lost members of their family in the service of the country. The wearing of such insignia will, they feel, express better than mourning the feeling of the American people that such losses are a matter of glory rather than of prostrating grief and depression. President Wilson has approved the recommendation, and in a letter to Dr. Anna Howard Shaw he writes: "I hope and believe that thoughtful people everywhere will approve of this action. . . . It has my cordial endorsement."

WHILE a majority of the states will, doubtless ratify the prohibition amendment to the United States Constitution, a more insidious and perhaps a greater evil menaces our Indians in the use of a substance known as "peyote," which is derived from cactus plants of northern Mexico, and is said to be fully as injurious as opium or Indian hemp. Following the example set by the states of Colorado, Nevada and Utah, which have prohibited the sale of this poison, a bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives at Washington to protect the Indians from all habit-forming drugs. The Indian Rights Association has appealed to all friends of the Indians to write to their congressmen, asking them to vote in favor of the proposed bill.

“Take It to the Lord in Prayer”

A SERMON BY REV. C. E. WINCOTT*

TEXT—II Kings 19: 14. “And Hezekiah received the letter of the hand of the messengers, and read it: and Hezekiah went up into the house of the Lord, and spread it before the Lord.”

HOW easy to say, “the letter”; and yet how much the words may mean! The mail-carrier, as he goes his rounds, would become the most melancholy of men if he thought much upon the contents of his mail-bag. To some families joy, to others misery—nay, to the same home joy treads on the heels of sorrow, or vice versa. We don’t know what tomorrow may bring forth, the letter carrier’s ring may be the knell of doom or the signal for peals of joyous laughter.

What a letter was that which Hezekiah received! In form it would be very different from our ideas of a letter. The Assyrians did not use paper, or even skins, but did their writing on clay. I have seen, in the British Museum, a conveyance of land written not on parchment, but on clay, and then baked hard. So it is very likely that the letter was a tablet of terra cotta.

It has been thought by some that Rabshakeh was the writer of these railing letters. This renegade Jew, like most apostates, gloried in his shame. He was a master of coarse and brutal invective, and could say things never to be forgotten. For instance, when he sneered at Hezekiah and told him that he would share the fate of the other nations whom Sennacherib had destroyed, and told him to note that the gods of those nations had not delivered them; and even goes to the length of suggesting that Jehovah was cheating the pious king, when encouraging him to believe that he was greater than Assyria. The letter ends by asking Hezekiah to think what had become of other crowned heads, and suggesting that soon he would join the company of those who had been degraded by Assyria.

This was trouble indeed, but it was trouble that might have been prevented. Hezekiah ought never to have paid tribute to Sennacherib. When first the demand was made, he should have called on the name of the Lord.

O what peace we often forfeit,
O what needless pain we bear,
All because we do not carry
Everything to God in prayer.

In II Kings 18 we read that Hezekiah prayed to be delivered; but he prayed to the king of Assyria. To stave off the threatened destruction, he had to cut off the gold from the doors of the temple. It was all lost. The greedy monarch was not to be thus satisfied; he meant having all the wealth that Solomon had accumulated. Let us learn to never submit to the claims of sin. We can never satisfy it. Much will have more. The devil has no right to a cent of our money, or a moment of our time. If we could have in the treasury of the Lord the tribute good people are paying to Satan, we should be able to carry on much of the Lord’s work that languishes for funds.

Young people, let me say to you, never give way to the claims of sin. If you submit once, you will have to submit again, until hell will talk of “vested interests” in your time and money!

WHAT did Hezekiah do with the letter? He did not send a hasty answer. Many a quarrel might have been prevented if men would spread disagreeable letters before the Lord. If you get letters that give you pain, before you pen a reply, send a message to God, and he will teach you to indite what may turn away wrath. If you are in trouble, let me counsel you to remember what is a command as well as a promise: “Call upon me in the day of trouble.” Far too many of us treat God as though he had no existence. We try everybody else before going to the Lord. We can quack with our small ailments, but when we feel in danger, we call in the physician, forgetting that the cold may be the prelude to a fever, and that little trials are sometimes opening the way for larger ones. *

Hezekiah did now what he ought to have done at the first. What a great deal of trouble he might have saved himself if, at the first appearance of the Assyrian army, he had gone to the house of the Lord to pray. Then he would have been saved the necessity of going there to cut off the gold from the doors. The right thing is always best, and in the long run the cheapest.

“Went up into the house of the Lord.” Where was he so likely to find God as in His house! I knew a godly and intelligent widow who had a great deal of trial, but who assured me that she was never in perplexity but she was sure to be guided to the right conclusion as she sat in church. Something either in the sermon, or lesson, or prayer, or hymn would tell her what to do.

In every new distress
We’ll to His house repair;
We’ll think upon His wondrous grace,
And seek deliverance there.

Hezekiah did not hear God reproach him for going elsewhere first. There is much force in the promise, “If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not.” Perhaps you have tried everybody else, and are almost ashamed to go to God now. Do not fear but He will treat you as kindly as He did Hezekiah.

HAVE you noticed the prayer of the king? It is indeed a model prayer; not like so many of our modern prayers, which must try the patience of God, going all round the world, instead of fastening upon the thing needed, and asking for that. If our prayers were more like telegrams we should have speedier answers. One of the best prayers I ever heard of was put up by a man who had been awakened at some special evangelistic service; it was in these words: “Lord, save me from the Liquor Saloon, for it has been my ruin!”

The prayer of the pious King appealed to God for the sake of His honor—“that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that thou art the Lord God.” How the Almighty is touched by an appeal of this sort. If we thought more of God’s honor in our prayers, we should be more often answered. Was the letter of Rabshakeh ever answered? Yes, for Jehovah answered it himself. He did not trouble Hezekiah to do it; and the answer is worthy of the Lord. Now he reproves the pride and annoyance of the king of Assyria—“Whom hast thou reproached and blasphemed!” In Isaiah 10 we find other allusions to the threat of Sennacherib; the prophet spoke of the feeling of God, and encouraged the fainting hearts of the people of God. But the answer never was sent to the Assyrian. God did not condescend to reply to him personally. He may have thought that His message had so dismayed Hezekiah that in a very short time there would be an embassy desiring peace, and offering abject submission. We know what the result was, and how suddenly the bolt of vengeance struck down the blasphemer.

Is it not the same to-day? Are not many of those who lift themselves up against the Lord doomed in the same way? God does not condescend to send an answer to their proud boastings, but He has replied; and could they but know what He has spoken, they would be in abject terror.

While nothing appears to have been said to the foe, the friends of Jehovah were much comforted by the reply to the letter. Jerusalem is represented as a Jewish maiden, laughing Assyria to scorn. Yes, when God laughs, we may. It would help us more if we cultivated sacred mirth. Why should the enemy be the only one to smile? “He laughs best who laughs last,” says the old proverb, but he who knows that he will laugh last, should laugh all the way through. God will win the day; then let none of us who are on His side whine and cry, but rejoice in the Lord, and in merriment sing psalms.

THERE is a postscript to God’s answer (see verse 35). “It came to pass that night . . . they were all dead corpses!” What a sight the camp must have been the next morning! There has been considerable discussion amongst the learned as to the cause of the destruction of so large an army, and it is generally understood now to have been the simoom. Cambyses, king of the Medes, lost 50,000 men by one of these dreadful winds. But whether the wind was the messenger, or whether an angel had the wind in his power, it matters not; we read of “stormy wind fulfilling His word.” God willed it, and nature hastened to do His bidding.

The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold;
And the sheen of their spears was like stars on the sea,
When the blue wave rolls nightly on deep Galilee.

Like the leaves of the forest, when summer is green,
That host, with their banners, at sunset were seen:
Like the leaves of the forest, when autumn hath blown,
That host, on the morrow, lay withered and strewn.

For the angel of death, spread his wings on the blast,
And breathed on the face of the foe as he passed:
And the eyes of the sleepers waxed deadly and chill,
And their hearts but once heaved, and forever grow still!

And the widows of Ashur are loud in their wail,
And the idols are broke in the temple of Boal;
And the might of the Gentile, unsmote by the sword,
Hath melted like snow in the glance of the Lord!

SENNACHERIB does not appear to have been with the main army, and so escaped for the time; but vengeance followed him home. Let us pause and contrast the two kings mentioned in this story, and we shall see the difference between the friends and foes of God. Look at Hezekiah. Though he made mistakes, he was a sincere, good man; he meant right, and so, in the day of distress, he could seek the Lord. Look at him in the house of God. He is in great trouble; he bows before the Lord. See, some one is coming! It is the prophet. What is the message? Will God reproach me for not coming before? Will He refuse now to help us? Listen, thus saith the Lord. “That which thou hast prayed to me against Sennacherib king of Assyria I have heard.”

Now, look at the enemy of God when he was in trouble. He, too, is in trouble, he has not prospered, and so will seek the help of his god. Tradition says that he intended to offer up two of his sons as human sacrifices. He is in the house of his god, seeking aid, when a step is heard. How quietly the men walk—there are two of them; they steal behind the worshipping monarch, they stab him with their knives; and, as he looks upon them with his dying gaze, he sees that those he intended to offer to his god have been his death!

“The light of the righteous rejoiceth, but the lamp of the wicked shall be put out.”

“Even So, Come, Lord Jesus”

By AMOS R. WELLS

THE world is a welter of blistering sorrow,
All is an anguish of infinite pain.
Where are the once happy hopes of tomorrow?
Under the festering heaps of the slain.
Where are the songs of the Bethlehem chorus?
Mocked in the battle, defeated and dumb.
Yet is one hope, and one promise, before us:
Even so, even so, Comforter, come!

Come, though the nations are reeling and falling;
Come, though the sages are silent in dread;
Come, though the mothers are sobbing and calling
Over the graves of the beautiful dead.
Deeper and darker our limitless error,
Louder the crash of the hurrying drum;
Wilder the maddening rush of our terror,
Even so, even so, Counselor, come!

Come, while the impious rage and deny thee;
Come at the height of their arrogant pride;
Come, while the ravening peoples defy thee;
Come in thy power and toss them aside.
Now, with thine enemies reeking and gory,
Counting thy saints as the slime and the scum;
Now, with the fiends at the top of their glory,
Even so, even so, Conqueror, come!

Come at the climax of horror and wailing,
Never so needed and never so sought.
Are not the prayers of thy people prevailing?
Has not iniquity perfectly wrought?
Now, as the Judases kiss and betray thee,
Now, as their evil has made up the sum,
Now, as thy people believingly pray thee,
Even so, even so, Lord Jesus, come!

Possessing All Things

SUNDAY, July 14. II Cor. 6:10. "Having nothing and yet possessing all things." It is surely one of the purposed ministries of apparent misfortune and disaster to open out the divino side of things and to unveil the heavenly glory. And indeed we may say that the seeming failure is no failure at all if it unveils the divine; the calamity has then become the medium of a greater triumph. Ellise Hopkins was called upon to walk rough roads, where for miles grinning defeat was her constant companion. Her life had been turned to a crusade whose conditions she viewed with repulsion. In the early stages of the unwelcome journey she lived under an irritating sense of personal ignominy and humiliation. And then there came the unveiling! She wrote these words in after days: "My long experience in the Valley of Humiliation has effectually rid me of the longing to see my glory!" She had been ravished by a vision of the glory of the Lord, and all smaller fears and resentments had faded away.

When our troubles destroy the yearning for our own glory they have been converted into the ministers of spiritual growth. The apparent rotting of the flax, when it is thrown into the seemingly unfriendly tanks, prepares the stronger strands for finished webs. And when our vanities and our self-gloryings rot away in the waters of hardship or affliction, we may be sure that the bitter waters have ministered to us as the veritable waters of life. When "my glory" changes into "thy glory," and when we are led to pray, "Show me thy glory," the valley of Achor has become a door of hope.

The God of Isaac

MONDAY, July 15. Ex. 3:6. "I am the God of Isaac." Every human character is a composite of strength and weakness, goodness and its opposite or its absence. Isaac was not entirely heroic, but he had the elements of heroism in large measure. The twenty-sixth chapter of Genesis contains an illuminating episode in the life of Isaac. He came of fighting stock, but when the Philistines claimed the wells his servants had dug, he yielded rather than fight—yielded more than once; he retired to new fields and dug new wells, and eventually he conquered the Philistines by his spirit of conciliation. He was a man who let his moderation be known unto all—his yieldingness (for this is the New Testament sense of the word moderation). Only a strong man can yield. It often takes more courage to retreat than to stand one's ground. Isaac was a man of prayer. This was the source of his strength. As such, he was not unworthy his father Abraham. And as such, he was not unworthy the friendship of God. That friendship he had, for God calls himself the God of Isaac. If God is the God of Isaac, then he is the God of all such men—the God of gentle spirits—the God of men who have it within their power to conquer, but who in mercy's name prefer to yield—the God of those who think more of their duties than of their rights. There are times when to stand upon our rights, our personal rights, is to stand upon dangerous ground, in so far as our relations to God are concerned. The mighty God is not ashamed to call himself the God of man who, with strength and right on his side, counsels his servants to avoid unnecessary strife.

Treachery

TUESDAY, July 16. I Sam. 22:9. "Doeg the Edomite, which was set over the servants of Saul, said, I saw the son of Jesse coming to Nob, to Ahimelech the son of Ahitub." Doeg is the Old Testament type of a wily, treacherous person. He happened to be at Nob, when David in his flight from the fury of Saul reached that place. Doeg had come to that place where Ahimelech was in charge of the sanctuary, to pay his devotion to the Lord. He observed the transactions between David and the priest. Ahimelech expressed surprise that David, who stated that he was traveling post haste on the king's business, should have come without food and arms, but accepted the plausible explanation which David gave him, and then let him have the shewbread from the sanctuary and the sword of Goliath. Doeg became the instrument through which Saul shed the first innocent blood in that long persecution of David to which his insane jealousy drove him. He became tale-bearer to the king, relating that he had seen David at the sanctuary. While pretending to be engaged on the performance of sacred duties he had stealthily observed and listened to what transpired between David and Ahimelech. But in relating Ahimelech's share of the transaction he purposely told a twisted tale. His account was so framed as to incriminate the priest, who had acted in perfect good faith toward David, and really believed that he was serving the king in giving aid and comfort to David. Like all traitors Doeg employed dishonest methods: suppression of facts, distortion of circumstances, lies, to gain his end. Finally, when the king in his rage pronounced the sentence of death on Ahimelech and his fellow priests and all his and their families, and the servants of Saul recoiled with horror when they were ordered to execute the king's decree, this mean and abandoned wretch Doeg with his own hand fell upon the holy men in their priestly attire, and slew them, and then went to slay all their relatives and dependents in the town. Thus he added murder to his other crimes. Treachery is diabolical work: in it are combined cunning, prevarication, and bloodthirstiness: all traits of the devil, who is a deceiver, liar, and murderer.

Falling at His Feet

WEDNESDAY, July 17. Rev. 1:17. "When I saw Him, I fell at his feet as dead." Happy are we if we have fallen at his feet, dead to self and sin, for then we are risen with him in newness of life and can ever say, with Paul and John, "Have I not seen the Lord?"

It may be your lot has been cast in isolation and loneliness, far away from home and friends; but with the Divine Visitor all the heavens break upon your sight with joy unspeakable and full of glory. You may have thought that your only companion was Tribulation, but when the Master comes he brings all heavenly beauty with him and fills the horizon with the splendor of his presence.

Jacob, in desolate banishment, saw his Lord as the golden ladder to the skies. Stephen, stoned, beheld, like John, the heavens open and the Christ waiting to embrace his spirit. Isaiah, enraptured at the sight of the Lord, high and lifted up, cried out, "Here am I; send me"; and Paul whispered, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

One can never be the same person after a view of his presence. Visions of him are not merely ecstatic moments of bliss, but, like the Transfiguration, they are for service in the valley among the multitudes. After John's Patmos vision, he penned the three Epistles, the fourth Gospel and the crowning book of the Bible—Revelation. He has thereby exerted an influence as great as any other writer in the Holy Scriptures.

Here is the supreme moment in the life of a human soul when we respond to His call, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." After worshipping and consecrating all at his feet, after hearing the sacred words from his loving lips, and after feeling his pierced hand upon the brow and resting our head upon his wounded breast, no wonder a new and glorious life begins, full of eternal years and heavenly fellowships.

The God of Jacob

THURSDAY, July 18. Ex. 3:6. "I am the God of Jacob." God never said a more amazing thing than when he called himself the God of Jacob. Jacob was a cheat. His honesty was of the bargain-counter kind. He was not above taking advantage of a weak-willed brother. Deceit was in his mouth and in his hand. Is it not amazing to be told that Jacob had a God? Is it not positively startling to know that God calls himself the God of Jacob?

Surely Jacob is a better man than he appears to be! He is. His faults lie upon the surface. His virtues are invisible at first glance. His great virtue is the high estimate he sets upon spiritual things. His birthright—a matter of spiritual privilege—is infinitely valuable in his sight. There is hope for a man like that, even though he be dishonest. He will shed his dishonesty. He will repent it and be restored. He will learn the value of honor too. But the man who despises his spiritual birthright, who holds religion a worthless thing—there is no hope for him in time or eternity. As the years go by the virtues of Jacob shine out. He sins and sorrows. He departs from the straight path and returns footsore, broken-hearted and weary. He seeks and finds God. He pays the penalty of transgression. Like David, he is purified by fire. So the God of Jacob is the God of a struggling man who struggles on, ascends step by step the painful path to reformation, restitution, honor, abiding peace. The God of Jacob is the God of a man who fights the evil within him, fights till morning leaves him lame.

The average man has in him comparatively little that makes him akin to Abraham, but may we not all hope to have as our Friend and Counselor, our Guard and Guide, the God of Jacob?

Appearing Before Him

FRIDAY, July 19. Ps. 42:2. "When shall I come and appear before God?" In these agitated words Korah's temple choir depicted the keen anguish of the person who would like to go to church on the solemn convocations of God's people, but cannot. This unfortunate person is described as panting after God as a hart panteth after the water brooks; yea, he is crying day and night over his spiritual privation. Let us not pronounce language such as we have in this Psalm poetic exaggeration. Of course, the loss of a thing is never felt by the person who never possessed it. The secular mind will wonder at such spiritual distress as is here expressed as something queer. It may regard it as affectation and a foolish display of piety. One must have tasted the Bread and Water of Life, to understand what hunger and thirst for these things are. But even such longing to be with the worshipers at the sanctuary on the holy days of the Church is truly a divine service. Wherever a heart of faith turns to its God, its Redeemer and Comforter, there a sanctuary is erected where God is truly worshiped in spirit and sincerity. The accidents of life, illness, afflictions, unavoidable engagements, may occasionally detain a believer from the courts of the Lord. Others may find themselves in localities where the true God is not known nor worshiped, or they may have been deprived of their liberty to go where they please, like prisoners and exiles. Besides, there are days when no public services are conducted at the usual place of worship, and the believer, though he would like to, cannot join with his brethren in prayer and praise to his God. In all such instances our losses at the common sanctuary can and ought to be made up to us by that sanctuary in which God loves to dwell before others, the sanctuary of a poor and contrite spirit and of a heart that trembles at God's Word. Any place is a holy place when we seek and find God there. Any season is a proper season for worship when our finite spirit meets the Infinite Spirit and communes with him on the basis of his revealed will of grace and righteousness.

The Vile May Be Pure

SATURDAY, July 20. Ps. 68:13. "Though ye have lain among the pots, ye shall be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold." Nature illustrates the wonderful transformations of grace. The filthy snow trampled under foot becomes distilled into the whiteness of the fleecy cloud. Luther Burbank, studying the marvelous laws of nature, is able to change the habits of plant life which have been retrograding. It is the death of the old thorny cactus and the new birth of the thornless. If nature's laws are built to produce such striking developments, shall we limit the God of nature, who gives a new birth to fallen manhood, if needed?

The Divine Husbandman transplants his redeemed ones into the gardens of the Lord. Think of the grand ideals toward which we may grow under his care and cultivation—the fullness of the stature of the perfect man in Christ Jesus. Bad habits are changed for good; the poisonous plant transformed into a tree of life, a palm of Paradise. The changes occurring every day in nature are only symbols of the higher development of the planting of the Lord. Out of the slums may grow a character whiter than the lily, adorned with the graces of angels, ornamented with the pearls of purity, the gems of virtue. The chief of sinners may become clothed with all the elegance of the saints in light, made mete for immortality. No artist can paint the glory of such Christian attainment; no mind conceive of the beautiful things God has prepared for those who love him. We know not what we shall be, but we know we shall be like him. We see through a glass darkly, but we do see. Enough is revealed by his Spirit to fill the heart with joy here and glorious hope for the hereafter.

Richest Fruit in Aged Christians

THE famous grapevine at Hampton Court, England, is probably the oldest large grapevine in the world. As its keeper was telling a visitor how many clusters of grapes it bore, the visitor's attention was called to the fact that the grapes were small. "Yes," the keeper replied, "an old vine cannot bear as large grapes and as large clusters as a young one, but they are richer and sweeter and finer in flavor. They are for the table of the Queen." In one thing this grapevine differs from the best of old Christians. In the real, true sense, the old Christian not only bears the richest, sweetest fruit, but he bears an increase in quantity in correspondence with increase in growth in grace or in the Christ image. "They that are planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age: Ps. 92:13, 14.—Rev. W. A. Jarrel, Dallas, Texas.

The Silent Elder

By
C. C. MILLER

IT was Monday evening. The annual congregational meeting of the first Church in R— was largely attended. All the reports submitted gave evidence of progress. The treasurer's account showed a neat balance, and the members of the congregation were congratulating the pastor on the bright outlook for the future.

A number of changes had been made in the election of the church officers. Mr. S—, who attended services but once a year, and then only to find fault and criticize, had managed to have himself elected a member of the vestry. Now was his chance to bring about the much-needed reformation he had so often dreamed about. "If the First Church is ever to go forward and lead in the community," he would say, "we must have in our pulpit a broad-minded, liberal man, who can fall in with the spirit of the times."

To begin with, then, the old pastor must go! But how to bring about the desired change Mr. S— did not know. He would consult Mr. K—, the "silent" elder, about the matter.

The next day, closeted with Mr. K— in his private office, the following conversation took place:

"Do you think the spiritual life of our congregation is what it ought to be?"

"No, I think not."

"Do you think our church is discharging her duty in accordance with the command of her Lord and Master?"

"No, I think not."

"Do you think our pastor is capable of dealing with the many present-day problems that arise from time to time, and that he fully realizes the great responsibility that rests upon him?"

"No, I think not."

"Do you think that our pastor is as he ought to be, fully endowed with extraordinary gifts from on high for the performance of the duties peculiar to his office?"

"No, I think not."

"Ha! Ha!" thought the wise and crafty S—.

"Now I've got you where I want you." And, thus encouraged, he came out with what he had up his sleeve.

"Now, do you not think that for the good of the congregation we had better make a change and secure the services of a younger man?"

THE faithful old elder drew himself up to his full height, and answered in good voice, "No, I think not."

"Why not? Did you not assent to everything I said a moment ago? Why are you so short with your answers?"

"Sit down there," said the silent elder. "I want to tell you why. I have been a member of the vestry of this church for a period of twenty years. There was a time when I felt as you do. Since then I have experienced a change of heart and mind. In my blindness I permitted myself to be led about by a so-called and self-appointed reformer. We had at the time a faithful pastor, who was willing to spend and to be spent. We soon took advantage of him and left him to draw the whole load.

"His strength began to fail, and instead of trying to lighten his burdens we recommended a change. Together we made his office as burdensome as we possibly could. We opposed all his plans, and filled his cup of bitterness to the brim. Under such circumstances, with the weight of responsibility and care lying heavily upon him, he broke down. With a sad and bleeding heart he retired from the field wherein he had so long labored, and another occupied his place. But hardly had he left us when, like a thunderbolt, the truth flashed upon us that we had blundered. Everywhere the fruits of his labor and unselfish sacrifices were in evidence.

"On Christmas day word was brought to me that our old pastor was sick, nigh unto death. I decided to pay him a visit, acknowledge my wrongdoing, and humbly beg his forgiveness.

"I was received with every mark of courtesy, but when I made known the object of my visit the pastor's wife said: 'I cannot permit you to enter the sick chamber; he is at the point of death, and a sight of you might disturb his last moments'.

"O God!" I cried, half aloud; 'who and what am I? Has it indeed come to this, that a faithful servant of the Lord cannot die in peace in my presence'?

"Acknowledging my sin, I begged her to show me to the sickroom, so that, kneeling before him whom I had wronged, I might beg his forgiveness.

"My wish was finally granted. As I entered the room, the old pastor who had instructed and confirmed me, united me in marriage, baptized our children and comforted us when the black crape fluttered at the door, opened his eyes and said: 'Brother, brother!' Then, raising his skeleton hand warningly, he cried: 'Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.'

"With trembling voice I began to confess my wrongdoing, but he heard not. I begged his forgiveness, but his lips were sealed in death.

"As I looked upon those quiet features, I noticed that a change had come over the face. The lines of weariness had disappeared as if God's hand had passed over it, and peace began to gather round the closed eyes.

"I offered my assistance to the bereaved widow and her family, but she would accept nothing from me, saying, 'The Lord who has helped us hitherto will not forsake us. I thank you, and I freely forgive you; but assistance we cannot accept.'

"I tell you, elder, the words of that dying pastor ring in my ears to this day, as though the Lord himself stood before me and uttered the deeply impressive warning: 'Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.'

"Now take my advice and profit by my experience. Do not go about disturbing the peace of the congregation. Forget the past. Look hopefully into the future. Lay hold of the present-day problems, and let us all push and pull together, and then there will be no vain regrets in the future."

Allentown, Pa.

GEORGE SHERWOOD EDDY has just finished another tour through China, during which he has held evangelistic meetings in almost all of the important Eastern cities. The campaign this year has been different from those he has conducted in times past—different, in fact, from those any one has conducted heretofore. This time there were no immense mass meetings, with broadcast invitations. The meetings were large, but only because there is now a large number of Christians actually working individually independent of campaigns and revivals.

Each non-Christian who attended the Eddy meetings this year in China, was invited by a Christian, who looked after him, sat next to him, talked with him, and followed him up. No Christian could come unless he brought a non-Christian with him. No one was admitted unless he had had some preparation for Christianity, either in a Bible class or a mission school, or through frequent personal conversations with converts in reference to the Christian teaching. In this way the mass movements that temporarily overwhelmed the missions after an old-fashioned revival, and then gradually ceased moving, were avoided. Men who have been studying the Gospel for months or years are not suddenly swept off their feet by the unexpected force of arguments or emotions. The purpose of the Eddy meetings was to bring to a verdict the wavering will of those who wanted Christianity, who already knew what it was, yet who could not quite be brought to decide to take the step.

Mr. Eddy spoke in a number of cities. He had been traveling through China for almost two months before he came to Peking, and had become well informed on the present conditions throughout all sections. Though he has been in China four times before, under varied forms of government, and has always been a student of Chinese affairs, he says now that China is nearer to the rocks at present than at any other time in her history. There is just one hope that he sees for China, that is Christianity. Without the dynamic to overcome the graft, corruption and other sins of her officials, students, merchants and laborers, China has no hope. It was on that basis that he presented his appeal to his hearers in Peking and other centers. And it was on that basis that he won many men for the cause of Christ.

A new spirit, a new idea, a new inspiration has been sweeping over the entire mission field throughout all Asia in the last few months. Mr. Eddy's campaign was only a part of this movement. It may be characterized briefly by the phrase "personal evangelism."

Mr. Eddy spoke primarily to students and officials. At one dinner in the Princeton University Center building, there were four members of the Cabinet present and many other distinguished leaders of the nation. They were so deeply impressed by the Christian ideal as the solution of China's difficulties that one of the Cabinet members invited Mr. Eddy to address the whole Cabinet group. An unfortunate accident prevented this meeting at the last moment. However, the effect on students was even greater than on officials. Many government and mission school students were reached by a combination of personal work and the Eddy meetings. All who decided were immediately enrolled in Bible classes, and a surprisingly large proportion of the men have attended the first few meetings of their groups. These men will be still further followed up, and after their period of probation as many as stick will be taken into the various churches.

The meetings were held in the churches and missions, and not in the Y. M. C. A. An excellent spirit of cooperation was manifested among all the denominations. The city was mapped out geographically into sections, each section being covered by a certain church, and if a man resided within the prescribed section of a church, he was expected to join that church, unless, of course, he showed a preference for any other. In this way, the equality of the various churches will be kept up as nearly as possible.

This Eddy campaign is merely a small part of a wonderful movement that is covering the whole of Asia. H. A. Popley and Howard Walter in India, Frank N. D. Buchman in China, and others in various centers, even before Mr. Eddy's arrival, had begun a movement whose chief object was personal work, which has already marked a definite step in all mission work throughout the continent. A new spirit has gripped the missionaries, a new inspiration has seized them. Access to the people of Asia, and especially those of the upper, educated classes, has grown wider during the past months than ever before. Men are eager for the Gospel, waiting for some one to speak to them, and too often they have waited in vain. There is no excuse for a single non-Christian student in any mission school. Too many Christians have been won on a nominal basis. They are not propagating Christians. Hereafter, emphasis will be laid on the working value of a Christian in terms of other men. It is the only way to spread the Good News in a telling, permanent fashion.

Mr. Buchman is known as one of the most successful personal workers in America. He had charge of the personal work aspect of Mr. Sunday's New York City campaign. He is filled with the desire and the ability to pass on his idea to others. He has had a large share in the new awakening in China. It was not Mr. Buchman, however, not Mr. Eddy, not Mr. Walter, not Mr. Popley—none of them alone, but a combination of these men, together with the whole missionary body, supplemented by the spiritual forces, that made possible the wonderful success of the recent Eddy campaign.

The Boy of Galilee

By MARY R. MERRIMAN

THERE was a Boy walked once in Galilee,
A child whose grace and sweetness were from God.
The steep and rugged paths he daily trod
And walked the yellow sands along the sea.
And every little child is happier now
Because of him, the Boy of Galilee.

There was a Toiler once in Galilee,
A patient Worker at a lowly trade.
Around his feet the little children played,
And tossed the curly shavings up with glee.
Now every sordid task is glorified
Because of him who toiled in Galilee.

The waves still lap the shores of Galilee,
And laborers plod from dawn till day is done.
He plies no more his task till setting sun,
No longer treads the sands along the sea;
But in the world's great heart he lives today,
Jesus our Lord, the Christ of Galilee.

The School That Prayer Built at Port Said

By S. M. ZWEMER, A.M., D.D.

THE traveler passing through the Suez Canal and spending a day or a night at Port Said, with coal dust covering the ship and the noise of hawkers tramping the dock, often seeks relief by a visit on shore, and in former days was impressed by nothing so much as the open wickedness of this gateway to the Orient. Times have changed, however. Since the war began Port Said has had a thorough cleaning. Good government and sanitation have done their work and Christian influence has helped to clean up the town morally. The British and Foreign Bible Society, the Sailors' Home and the Christian school are found at Port Said.

Some one has said: "God loves with a great love the man whose heart is bursting with a passion for the impossible." In November, 1911, nothing seemed more impossible than that two Swedish ladies formerly working in Tunisia and unexpectedly landing at Port Said would be able to gather over 150 Moslem girls into a boarding-school—waifs taken from the very streets of that native quarter, which was entirely a slum district of the worst description.

"ON our arrival here," says God's heroine, "we took a few small rooms in an Arab house, and for two weeks we had no liberty in the Spirit to undertake any work; we could only pray and wait upon the Lord for direction. Then our Moslem neighbors began to ask us to open a school for girls."

"In fear and trembling we began work, but soon the dark narrow place where we lived became insufficient, and on the 15th of March, 1912, we moved to larger rooms. This was a step to be taken in faith, but our Father had shown his glory in providing day by day. We could now furnish three class-rooms, but then there remained only one usable room for our personal need. The one private room then became our mutual bedroom, dining-room, sitting-room, reception-room, etc. Under the wooden floor was a ditch that we had not noticed where all uncleanness from the house gathered.

"The work grew; many visitors came; we had no place to get alone for prayer and rest; deadly gases exhaled through the floor from the ditch and attacked us again and again. At last Miss Ekland got typhoid fever. Now it became an house and the work grew. The school consists entirely of Moslem girls, and all of them are receiving a thorough Christian training. "We had quite a fight," says Miss Eriesson, "before we got full freedom to read the Bible with the girls, and several of them were taken away from the school for the Gospel's sake." At the time the war broke out the work was closed for the summer; the post failed them; and the banks were closed. But faith triumphed again. A lady in California sent a special gift because she had heard of the work from a visitor passing through Port Said. It has been a faith mission from the outset.

Entering School

urgent necessity to find new premises as soon as possible."

BY prayer and faith step by step the needs of the little mission were supplied. They soon moved into a larger

TOWARD the end of this year the mission has made a bold venture, investing a special gift they had received of £1,300 in the purchase of a house which was offered them in the nick of time. After much prayer the investment was made, and now all that remains is to pray down and pay down the mortgage, £1,700. God, who has provided in the past, will send what is needed that the work of giving light to those in darkness, purity of speech and love by changing their environment and showing the love of Christ by example and precept may go on apace.

"We had much joy last week," says Miss Eriesson, "when we could put God's Word into the hands of a new class. It does take time for the girls to learn to read enough to be able to read the Bible. You should have seen those twenty-seven girls when we told them we were going to try to let them read the text for the Bible lesson. They jumped for joy and some kissed the Book!"

soon again be fighting with the Allies for the cause of freedom, and that the days of the Bolsheviks were numbered. He said in an interview following his address that Russia was like a strong man recovering from a sickness, that all she needed was assistance from the outside. He said "she does not want intervention in her internal affairs; it is economic and financial aid that she needs." Reports of the murder of the former Czar, Nicholas Romanoff, at Ekaterinburg in the Urals, were apparently confirmed from two sources on June 27, and denied from two other sources on the 28th. Petrograd on June 17, was reported as facing famine.

BRITISH-FRENCH ATTACK. British troops in Flanders in a surprise attack on June 28 advanced their lines east of the forest of Nieppe for an average depth of 1,500 yards over a front of three miles, capturing three villages, over 300 prisoners and 22 machine guns. French troops south of the Aisne on the same day took from the Germans a series of heights west of Cutry, southw st of Soissons, advancing over a mile on a four and a half mile front and taking 1,060 prisoners.

REPORT BOLSHIEVIKI OVERTHROWN. Reports were current on June 28 that Generals Kaledine and Korniloff with German support had taken Moscow from the Soviet government and had proclaimed as Czar the Grand Duke Nicholas, former Commander in Chief of the Russian army and uncle of the former Czar. There was also a rumor that Paul Miliukoff and Alexander Guchkoff had reached Harbin and had initiated a counter revolutionary movement. Another rumor pictured the Red Guard as murdering its officers and surrendering, and Lenine and Trotzky as in flight. None of these could be confirmed on June 29.

STRIKERS DEMAND PEACE. Strikers from the factories of Vienna, on June 24, demanded that the Austrian government invite the governments of enemy countries to enter into peace negotiations. Rebellious outbreaks in two Hungarian garrisons at Gyor and Pees were reported to have resulted in 2,000 soldiers being condemned to death.

Arrangements have been made for mobile kitchens to serve for four weeks one warm meal a day to 100,000 persons; the meal consisting of soup, 100 grams of meat and vegetables.

THE BITER BIT. The sinking of one German submarine by another was reported on June 24, by a torpedo aimed at a supply ship, which successfully maneuvered and avoided being hit. On June 24 the sinking was reported of the British transport Dwinsk, 550 miles east of Sandy Hook. The Dwinsk was returning to America with no passengers. At last reports one life-boat containing 43 members of the crew were still missing. The sinkings of Allied and neutral shipping by submarines in May totaled 355,694 tons; the vessels completed in British and American yards totaled 372,608 tons.

AMERICAN REGIMENT TO ITALY. General Pershing, on June 27, dispatched a regiment of Infantry to Italy, not as reinforcements, but as an expression of Allied solidarity. It was announced on June 28 that American troops were holding eight sectors of the front in France.

EIGHT BILLIONS IN BONDS. A bill was introduced in Congress, on June 27, which proposed to give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to issue $8,000,- 000,000 in bonds over and above existing authorizations and to loan to our Allies $2,500,000,000 more. With $4,000,000,000 of bonds authorized but not yet issued this act will make possible an offering in the Fourth Liberty Loan of from $8,000,000,000 to $12,000,000,000. of this total probably $6,000,000,000 will be taken by the banks in Treasury certificates before the loan is offered. The bill was passed by the House June 28.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The great American launching bee on the Fourth of July was, on June 26, scheduled to include 94 ships, totaling 485,186 tons. Of the 94 ships, 42 are steel vessels and 52 wood, the steel vessels totaling 280,186 tons. . . . A plan is under foot for the delivery of a great many seaplanes in France by transatlantic flight. . . . The House Committee on Appropriations reported on June 22 a bill carrying appropriations and authorizations for the expenditure of $5,435,096,224. Of this amount more than $3,000,000,000 will be spent on guns and mortar batteries, to be constructed under a program running three years, the first deliveries to be early in 1919. The bill was passed on June 24. A $40,000,000 gun plant is to be erected for the government on Neville Island, in the Ohio river near Pittsburgh. . . . An American steamship reaching port on June 23 brought 216 officers and men, who were reported to be the crew of an American warship sunk in collision somewhere in the West Indies. . . . President Wilson, on June 24, urged upon a delegation of Senators the passage of the resolution for the suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution. . . . The Senate on June 24 ratified the draft treaty with Great Britain. Men resident in either country, liable to military service in the other, may now be drafted in the country of residence.

EXPERIENCED car owners have learned that "X" Liquid is the first and only practical method of repairing radiator leaks without solder or welding—and without injury to any part of the cooling system.

One can of "X" poured into the water finds all leaks—in the radiator, pump, gaskets, connections, etc., and repairs them in 10 minutes. "X" works automatically—without fuss or bother. And its constant use in the water prevents future leaks.

When you can get an absolutely Scientific product—recommended by automobile engineers and endorsed by nearly every radiator maker—why should you weaken your leaky radiator by soldering it? Or why take chances on choking the cooling system with cements, powders or other "dopes" in solid or liquid form?

Fact is—you shouldn't! Not when you realize that the same "X" Liquid you pour into the water to repair leaks—will loosen all Rust and Scale. And if "X" is kept in the water it will prevent new Rust and Scale from forming!

"X" Liquid keeps the water passages clean, improves cooling and helps the engine perform better. Get "X" Liquid at your dealer's—or we will ship direct on receipt of price.

Large Size, $1.50 will do a $25 repair job!
Ford Size, 75c will do a $15 repair job!

Every Drop of Havoline Oil Makes Good

Every drop of Havoline Oil is like every other drop. There are no "seconds," no weaklings, none that ask for exemption from the important work of properly lubricating the intricate mechanism of your car, under conditions of highest heat and severest pressure.

The uniform quality of Havoline Oil makes every drop thoroughly equal to the requirements of complete lubrication. For partial lubrication, or the breaking down of the film of oil that keeps moving surfaces apart, is deadly to a car. It causes gas leakage, loss of power, decreased mileage on gas, excessive friction and wear, and bigger repair bills.

HAVOLINE
OIL

"It makes a difference"

Thousands of careful motorists have such complete faith in Havoline Oil that they refuse to use any other lubricant even occasionally. They prize that peculiar satisfaction of a perfect running motor, unfailing acceleration, and noiseless transmission of power to the rear wheels.

That's why Havoline Oil makes a difference.

Havoline Oil comes in sealed containers, your guarantee of uniform quality, full quantity, all-Havoline, no waste, no impurities.

Havoline greases are compounded of Havoline Oil and pure, sweet tallow. Clean to handle and correct in body.

"A Mixed Salad"

TAKING letters as they come to us, without attempting to group subjects into harmonious sequence, we present members, now and then, with what may be called "a mixed salad." That compounded for this week we hope and believe will be found seasonable and refreshing.

In reading your Corner concerning rice I did not find that you saved the water in which the rice was boiled for any purpose. As for instance—soups. I read that the Japanese soldiers asked for the water in which rice was boiled and left the rice for officers, and that the Japanese common soldiers were the better physically, the water containing the most nourishment. The same is true with the water in which onions, spinach, etc., are boiled. It is excellent for soups.—A VETERAN READER (New York).

That I have already called attention to the duty of utilizing the water in which rice is cooked does not make it expedient to exclude your pleasant note, embodying yet another anecdote illustrative of the value of the liquid. I may add that rice-water has long been recognized by dietitians as digestible and strengthening to fever patients and invalids of weak digestive organs. Mixed with milk, it forms a palatable and nourishing food for infants.

All of which emphasizes the injunction, "Don't throw it away!"

A short time ago word came that Florida could have no more wheat flour until after wheat harvest. So we thought we must see if some substitute could not be found. I remembered the few barley loaves of the Bible—how in the hands of our blessed Lord they had fed a multitude. My son said he had once eaten rye bread in a restaurant and it was quite good. I was also advised to try peanut meal. So we bought fifty cents' worth of each of these meals for trial. Today at dinner my son said when eating rye biscuit, "We need not miss wheat. Rye makes a good substitute." We like barley just as well. If we were children we might play we are eating molasses cakes from the color, on account of rye and barley, and as for the peanut meal we might be enjoying chocolate cakes. However, I think after this I shall use the peanut meal we have on hand. If I were to name my bread I should call it the Busy Woman's Bread.

Recipe

Two cups of water or sweet milk, or milk and water; two tablespoonfuls of shortening; two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice; one slightly rounding teaspoonful of soda; two teaspoonfuls of salt; one egg; and flour to make a stiff dough that will drop from a tablespoon. Stir shortening, lemon juice, egg and salt together; add liquid. Ingredients should be warm enough so that the shortening will not harden. Put soda in sifter on flour; stir quickly and drop by the spoonfuls into hot greased gem pans and bake in hot oven. This bread has the merit of not being touched by hands that might not always be perfectly clean.—Mrs. A. N. (Tallahassee, Florida).

I wonder if you have a recipe for bread-making which calls for the use of not only potatoes but oatmeal and rye flour? If so, that would help a great many of us with small families who must needs purchase oatmeal in order to obtain flour.—C. D. C. (Brooklyn, N. Y.)

The obligations of the Corner to you are already so heavy that I refer your inquiry earnestly to our practical cooks and housewives. A member sent in the following recipe for muffins which may be useful while you are waiting for a formula which will combine in "loaf bread," raised with a potato sponge, both barley and oatmeal:

Oatmeal and Barley Muffins

One cup of oatmeal; one cup of barley; one tablespoonful of soft mashed potato; two even teaspoonfuls of baking-powder; one cup of milk; one egg; an even teaspoonful of salt; one tablespoonful of melted shortening.

Sift the flour, salt and baking-powder together three times. Beat the egg very light, and add to the milk alternately with the mashed potato. When the mixture is very light and smooth stir in the shortening and pour gradually into the prepared flours. Whip hard for three minutes and bake in greased and warm muffin tins or gem-pans.—Mrs. A. D. (New Jersey).

I have tried several times to can corn for winter use, but it always spoils. Can you give me a good recipe? "Ma Sunday" says her maid dries all their corn for winter use. I would try that if I only knew the process. Now if you could give us recipes on these points it might help housekeepers in their fight against the "H. C. of L."—MAY G. (Chicago).

Cut the corn from the cob and let all the juice that will come away without squeezing ooze out through a fine, perfectly clean sieve.

Transfer the corn to another sieve lined with cheesecloth or mosquito netting, and set in the open air, raised upon sticks so the air can get at the under side. Stir frequently, gently, so as not to break the grains. Then transfer to tissue paper and lay upon the grating of an open oven. In a day the corn should be dry. Leave it in the sun for some hours. Pack in boxes lined with tissue paper with the same between the layers of corn.

This is a primitive method practiced for years by country housekeepers. There are now patent "vegetable dryers" on the market that will do the work with less time and trouble.

In your interesting article upon potatoes, you offer no recipe for potato salad. Maybe you can find room for this which I have used with satisfaction for ten years?

Potato Salad

Boil eight potatoes in their skins; peel and set aside until they are cold. Slice them and sprinkle them with a little grated onion, unless a strong onion flavor is wished, in which case use more of the vegetable. Season with pepper and salt, pouring over all five tablespoonfuls of oil that has been well mixed with two tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Toss and stir all together and set upon ice until wanted.

And this when there is mashed potato left from yesterday in the refrigerator. Don't think it must be made into cakes or croquettes in hot weather:

Potato Salad Balls

Add to the left-over mashed potatoes two or three tablespoonfuls of vinegar; the same of olive oil, two teaspoonfuls of grated onion, or less, according to taste. Make into little balls. If desired, parsley may be chopped and added. These are dainty to serve on lettuce leaves as a salad, with boiled dressing or mayonnaise.—A CONSTITUENT OF "YE OLDEN TIME" (Peoria, Ill.).

Whose signature and whose work I recognize with lively pleasure. Let us hear from you again and repeatedly. Your recipes are a welcome addition to our list of potato dishes.

I am sending you a recipe of my own for barley flour gems which we think are very nice. Our bread, which for a time has been mostly of barley flour, is excellent. Piecrust made entirely of barley flour is fine, too, using just enough wheat flour to make it easy to roll. I make my bread just the same as with wheat flour, always using potato yeast.

Barley Flour Gems

One heaping cupful of barley flour; two teaspoonfuls of baking powder; a little salt, and one tablespoonful of shortening (whatever you may use). Mix with half sweet milk and half cold water—not too stiff. Bake in gem or muffin pans in a rather hot oven.—Mrs. D. R. (Laconia).

Thank you!

Dry yeast (or yeast foam) comes in small cakes. It can be bought in any grocery store and will keep for months in a dry place. I have used it for many years with good results. In the afternoon put one yeast cake to soak in a half cup of lukewarm water with a teaspoon of sugar. Make a sponge at night as follows: place in bread pan two quarts of lukewarm water, the yeast, three tablespoonfuls of fat, sugar and salt to taste, and enough flour to make a stiff batter. Stir hard for ten minutes. Set in a warm place over night. First thing in the morning mix by adding more flour and knead thoroughly; then let rise. Mold in loaves and place in baking-pans. Let rise and bake in moderately hot oven. This will make six big loaves. I am using barley flour, rye flour and corn flour, and very little white flour, and the bread is both good and healthy.—Mrs. A. J. A. (Turlock).

Americans Press On

AMERICAN troops on June 23 finally cleared of Germans all of Belleau Wood, northwest of Chateau Thierry. The Germans still held some successfully concealed machine-gun nests in the northeast corner of the wood. The Americans, resorting to Indian tactics, stalked the positions one by one. The fighting became so mixed at hand to hand that neither side dared use its artillery. After about four hours of close work the wood was entirely behind the American lines, and the Germans were retaliating with a gas attack.

Having driven the Germans out of Belleau Wood the American forces faced a heavily fortified ridge guarding the German positions before the villages of Belleau and Torcy. Machine guns hidden in caves on the ridge, almost immune from artillery fire, kept the new American lines under an annoying fire. It was necessary to take the ridge. On June 25 the American lines were withdrawn slightly, and the guns were turned loose for a thirteen-hour stretch of shelling, during which 4,000 projectiles were rained upon the Germans. At 6 o'clock in the evening the Americans started to storm the ridge, the artillery fire being shifted to create a barrage behind the German position, which was held by more than a thousand men belonging to the division recently brought back from Russia. The German artillery opened a heavy fire, even shelling the ridge after the fighting had come to close quarters, slaughtering their own men in attempts to stop the Americans. In seven hours of bitter hand-to-hand fighting with bayonets and hand grenades and machine guns, the Americans were complete masters of the ridge, 700 of the former garrison were dead or wounded and between 250 and 350 were prisoners of the Americans. A large number of machine guns were taken, and those in working order were turned against their former owners. The holding of the ridge imperils the German positions in the two villages of Torcy and Belleau. The American attack forestalled a German attempt to retake Belleau Wood.

SECRETARY BAKER and General March, Chief of Staff, in a hearing before the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate on June 26, asked that legislation extending draft ages be postponed for from sixty to ninety days, at the end of which time the War Department would have complete statistics as to the availability of shipping, the needs of the overseas army, and the number of men available at different ages. The Secretary announced that between August 1 and December 31 875,000 would be called to the colors.

On June 26, the first anniversary of the landing of the first American troops in France, Secretary Baker, following up the announcement that the number sent overseas exceeded 900,000 men, declared that nearly 70 per cent. were fighting men; the ordinary proportion is 40 per cent. non-combatant and 60 per cent. combatant. The American forces in France, therefore, on July 1, comprising nearly 1,000,000 men, numbered more than 600,000 candidates for the march to Berlin.

General Pershing's report of the action, on June 25, south of Torcy, put the number of prisoners taken at 240, of whom five were officers, with nineteen machine guns, several automatic rifles and a quantity of other material. Successive counter-attacks broke down with loss, the Americans retaining every foot of ground gained.

On the night of June 26 American aviators successfully bombed the railway junction at Conflans, east of Verdun.

Summer Night on a Lake

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE lake was like a silver prayer that sang against the shore, the night was purple dark and still—it seemed an open door to mystic lands that we had dreamed; to places far away from things that are the vital things when seen by light of day.

We drifted softly, silently; it seemed profane to speak, for any words that we could say were colorless and weak! We drifted on—a million stars were watching from on high. We drifted in a perfumed vale between the earth and sky!

There were so very many stars, like gems set in the night. They seemed unlike all other stars—more kind they were, and bright. It seemed as if they almost spoke for mortal ears to hear; they seemed to be alive and gay and radiantly near.

The moon sailed like a boat of flame upon a phantom sea. And as I watched it creeping down, it somehow seemed to me that it was trying very hard to reach the night-bound earth, to teach our weary eyes to smile, to fill our hearts with mirth. It was a very pleasant moon—a slender moon and young; it seemed a moon of hope and faith and songs as yet unsung. It seemed a moon of tender verse—a moon whose friendly eye would look at us, and understand, and laugh as we went by!

We drifted on, we did not speak, the earth was much too still. Yet it was full of subtle sounds. The tragic whippoorwill called once from some dim forest tree, a loon cried through the dark; and we could hear the splash of frogs, and once the far-off bark of a distrustful shepherd dog on guard before some home—and we could hear the stealthy tread of little beasts that roam along the shore where shadows creep—and once a fish leaped high, and we could see his scales agleam with moonlight from the sky.

THE world seemed all enwrapped in peace—the lake was calmly wide. It seemed a strange distorted dream that people fought and died across the sea, it seemed unreal that war had bared its sword—it seemed as if all nature knelt in worship to the Lord. He was the beauty of the night, the boundless stretch of space that hung above, all lit by stars. It seemed as if the face of God was just behind it all; it seemed as if His hand, in warm compassion and appeal was stretched above our land.

I sometimes wonder what God thinks about our little fears. I sometimes wonder how he feels about our futile tears! For he has made so many worlds, and each of them is placed a tiny star in heaven's arch—perhaps we have disgraced the little star that is our world by discontent and hate. . . . I looked into the far-flung sky and thought how God must wait for us to wake from this, our dream, our dream that is so small beside the worlds that he has made and set above us all to shine on us and light the way when nights are dark and grim! I looked above into God's stars—and said a prayer to him.

We drifted closer to the shore—we saw the home lights grow out of the dusk; they seemed to be such happy lights, to know that we were drifting silently and touched with deep content. . . . Some one was singing far away, the liquid murmur blent with all the other beauties that came creeping to our hearts. It was no wonder-song we heard, but just the sort that starts the tears to coming in the eyes, that makes you think again of half-forgotten humble things—of fragrant summer rain upon a bed of mignonette, of sunset's pearl and gray; the sort of song that brings the thought of loved ones far away.

I dipped my fingers in the lake and little ripples crept across the silver surfaces like laughter that has slept a thousand years and wakes again with errant drowsy sound—the water was half warm, half cool, and gently swirled around my fingers, it was light as mist, soft as a baby's kiss; it seemed as if the summer day had melted into this—this night of wonder and of rest, of song and stars and prayer, of water like a melted smile and vaguely perfumed air.

I WONDER if some flower grows at night beside calm lakes—some vivid azure-colored plant that, closed in daytime, wakes when all the world is dark and still? For, oh, it seems to me that night holds flowers that we seek but never come to see! It seems as if a fairy hand has sent them shooting up out of the night, and filled with dreams each fragile flowered cup. It seems as if they sing of sleep, of pale enchanted hours, and magic that is golden-touched—these vivid-colored flowers.

We drifted on, it seemed as if the young moon touched the trees—we drifted on in silence, but a sudden springing breeze came whispering to tell us tales of things we longed to know—where orioles had built their nest, and where the moonbeams go when night is done, and if the souls of blossoms pass away, and how God paints the eastern sky when night fades into day.

We drifted silently along—the breeze became more chill—we heard again the mournful cry of the sad whippoorwill. The moon slipped down and out of sight, the earth seemed wistful now, and so we noiseless swung around. The water at our bow spread like a fan on either side—a fan of spangled foam; we swung around, still silently, and started back toward—Home.

And yet the lake was still a prayer of silver, on the shore—and half I wished that we might drift in silence—evermore.

The Liberty Theatre

THE War and Navy Departments are determined to keep the environment of the enlisted men clean and wholesome. The Commission on Training Camp Activities, in pursuance of this object, has erected up to date about thirty theatres, nearly equally divided between the National Army cantonments and the National Guard camps. In all of them clean plays are presented by players organized under the direction of the Commission.

Mirth and melody hold the most appeal for the soldier boys. A comparison of attendance at the various plays shows that the drama does not attract the enlisted man, after a hard day's training, so much as musical comedy or vaudeville, without plot, but full of sparkling repartee and lively music.

When the theatres were first established, the scale of prices was set at 10, 15, 20 and 25 cents. But it was soon found that the soldiers passed by the cheaper plays in favor of high-grade attractions, even at a higher price. So the prevailing price is now 25 cents, with an additional 25 cents for reserved seats.

For many of the men who cannot afford to pay their way to the theatre out of their own pockets, "Smileage" is solving the problem. "Smileage" tickets are accepted in lieu of cash at all the Liberty theatres, and in camps where there are no theatres it has been arranged to have them redeemed through private concessions.

The camp theatre is an innovation in the military world. It is pioneer work. Other governments are encouraging camp shows, but they have not gone to the length of building theatres and organizing companies for their production. It has remained for our government to do this.

The Liberty theatre is not a money-making institution. In fact it has scarcely been a paying enterprise to date. But things are gradually adjusting themselves and any money that is made on the shows in the future will be turned back to the soldiers in the form of improved entertainment and lower prices.

Her One Deformity An Unnecessary Corn

When you see or feel a corn remember this:

Millions of people have found a simple, easy way to completely end this trouble. It is the Blue-jay plaster.

When a corn appears, they apply a Blue-jay, and do it in a jiffy. Then they forget it, for the corn never pains again.

In 48 hours they remove the Blue-jay, and the corn is gone. Only a rare corn needs a second application.

There is no muss, no bother, no repeated applications. There is no after-soreness.

There are none of the faults of the old-time methods, harsh and inefficient. It doesn't take one-tenth the time it takes to pare a corn. And paring cannot end it.

For your own sake, make a test of Blue-jay. See what it does with one corn. It is doing just that with millions of corns, in a gentle, scientific way.

Please find out—and now—what folly it is to have corns.

Praying to God

International Sunday School Lesson for July 21

Luke 11:1-13 and Psalm 145:18, 19

By REV. GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

OUR third study in the Christian Life is concerned with prayer—a big subject indeed, seeing that all sorts of men everywhere have prayed all kinds of prayers, and that critics have sprung up to scoff at the whole thing. To begin with, the very fact that we are to study prayer shows that we realize there are problems connected with the matter. But may we not as Christian people agree that it is better to pray unintelligently than not to pray at all, since God is a Father who stoops to bear with the limitations of his child? The learned scholar who does not pray is missing something that the poorest and most ignorant convert in the lowliest mission enjoys. May we not also agree that prayer has been greatly abused and misunderstood, and is important enough to merit our most earnest thought? Of course there is a danger in over-analyzing so spiritual a process as prayer. There must be no frivolity in our mood, but on the contrary the most reverent and humble attitude of mind if a discussion of prayer is to avoid contention and misunderstanding, and really result, as it should, in more prayerfulness and holier aspirations. Begin by praying for guidance.

The Noblest Aspect of Prayer

Prayers differ widely. Some are thanksgivings purely. Others are couched in terms of contemplative adoration of the Almighty without even the statement of gratitude to him. Many, perhaps most, are petitions for benefits or requests for personal blessings or interventions from God. Still others are intercessory, where the petitioner is thinking of others rather than himself, and is beseeching the Father on behalf of other members of the great family. Surely there is abundant place for every one of these. But is not the noblest aspect of our prayer life after all communion with God? What our souls need most is fellowship with the Unseen. The child wants to talk to his father and to know that he cares and understands. The Father welcomes the confidence of his child, and is able to do more for him because of their mutual understanding. Prayer as communion uplifts prayer standards in petition, enlarges the elements of gratitude, tends toward more intercession and less begging for personal advantage.

Phillips Brooks said, "Prayer is not conquering God's reluctance but laying hold of God's willingness." So we must seek to get close to God's heart, to understand his ways of working with us and through us, to get ourselves in line with his purposes. Communion does this. When Jesus went out upon the mountain and spent all night in prayer, we know well that he did not repeat formulas, nor pour out endless petitions for gifts. We believe he consulted with his Father, meditated for hours, turning over matters, planning, advising in a spiritual communion that was like our own at its best. Sometimes our season of prayer is like a heart-to-heart conference with God. Then it is effectual indeed.

Such prayer opens the way for God to use us to do his will. There are some things he cannot do except with your hands; if not they are left undone. Just so there are some things you will not even suspect he wants you to do unless you really pray, unless your prayer is a communion so real that he speaks to you as well as you with him. Prayer puts your heart as well as your hands at his disposal.

Selfish and Unselfish Praying

It seems strange to use such a word as selfishness in connection with the word prayer! Yet how many selfish prayers ascend daily to God, unless the poets are right when they tell us such prayers do not rise above our heads! We have all heard of the man who prayed for himself and his wife, his son John and his wife, "us four and no more"! Contrast that with the prayers of men and women of the kingdom spirit whose spiritual vision embraces the whole world, who pray for this one and that one in the uttermost parts of the earth, and for the Church Universal, which is the body of Christ. Are our supplications wide in their sweep, or do we really pray for four or five, and no more?

Then remember how prone we are to attempt to dictate to the All-wise. What we want seems so important that we almost insist upon it, forgetting to add with Jesus, "Nevertheless, Father, not my will but thine be done." Longfellow said, "As frightened women clutch at the reins when there is danger, so do we grasp at God's government with our prayers." We must not pray in meeting as though we were telling God what to do. Neither should we make the burden of our precious moments of communion requests for things to the exclusion of all else. It is better to pray for opportunities, and perhaps best of all humbly to ask God to point out to us the opportunities we fail to see.

The Model Prayer is a blow to selfish praying. Its pronouns are "Thy" and "our" and "us," omitting completely the capital "I" and the ever-present "me" and "mine." You cannot pray it alone, for though you be in your inner chamber, the moment you begin those precious words you reach out and sweep the world of struggling, sinning, sorrowing men and women up into the presence of the common Father. It is absolutely equal in the benefits it brings. Its dominating note is social—the Kingdom, the children of the Kingdom, the human family of God. It puts the will of God first, differing from so many prayers that launch at once into the vagrant wishes of the worshiper. It implies a consecration to the doing of that will and the hallowing of that Name. The only material thing it mentions is bread for daily sustenance; all the rest has to do with our spiritual relationships to God and our social relationships with one another. Its burden is to clear the way for God's blessings by removing the sins and the grudges that hinder the coming of his Spirit to human hearts. It includes a virtual promise to do one of the hardest things for a man to do—forgive others their trespasses.

Cheap Praying

Such a prayer as we have been discussing was born of a life of communion with God and of struggle to accomplish his will. Too much praying is the hasty (and sleepy) expression of ill-considered though well-meaning hopes. How cheap men can rate such a thing as prayer; the exclamation of the thoughtless, the cry of distress of the worst in their extremity, the vain repetitions of formalists who rattle off the familiar phrases with scarce an idea of their meaning! Whereas the Bible speaks of prayer as wrestling in agony, with crying and tears, with fervency of spirit, with penitence and humility.

Say, what is prayer when it is prayer indeed? The mighty utterance of a mighty need! That man is praying who doth press with might Out of his darkness into God's own light.

Prayer is something that has to be learned: not only by the two-year old who lisps uncomprehended syllables at mother's knee, but also by the growing youth, the mature Christian worker. It is hard to learn to run a lathe, or to play a violin, and each takes practice. It is harder to use such a delicate instrument as prayer without instruction by a master. "Lord, teach us how to pray!" must be our petition too. Paul understood that practice makes perfect in prayer when he said: "Continue in prayer, pray without ceasing, praying always."

W. E. Orchard in his beautiful book of prayers called "The Temple" prays thus: "O God, forgive the poverty, the pettiness, Lord, the childish folly of our prayers. Listen, not to our words, but to the groaning that cannot be uttered; hearken not to our petitions, but to the crying of our need. So often we pray for that which is already ours, neglected and unappropriated; so often for that which never can be ours; so often for that which we must win for ourselves; and then labor endlessly for that which can only come to us by prayer. How often have we prayed for the coming of thy kingdom, yet when it has sought to come through us we have sometimes barred the way; we have wanted it without in others, but not in our own hearts."

The Best Argument for Praying

Our lesson text gives us the best argument for praying. In other realms, it is they who ask, who seek persistently, who knock at all doors who make the discoveries and achieve the power. So also in the spiritual realm. Those who seek find. The best road of search is called Prayer. But even this reason Jesus did not put without one of his telling parables. Even a sleepy grudging neighbor would finally rise and help out the man who sought three loaves of bread. How much more will a kind, patient, fatherlike God respond to the earnest requests of his own children! Even an unjust judge would heed the importunate widow, and will not the just Guardian of the universe redress those who seek his aid? If earthly parents know how to give good gifts to their children, shall not the All-Father give gifts, even the supreme gift of communion with himself, to those that seek diligently for his face?

The only argument against prayer is that God doesn't care. The burden of the whole Bible is "God cares." He who prays not is leaving undeveloped the highest part of his nature.

For what are men better than sheep or goats. That nourish a blind life within the brain, If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer Both for themselves and those that call them friend?

Young People's Topics for July 21

Jesus' Love of the Out of Doors

Epworth League Topic. Matt. 4:18; 12:1; 13:1; 14:13; 22:25

THIS topic is eminently fitting at the midsummer season, and it would be fine if the meeting for July 21 could be held out of doors. In fact, much may be gained if the church has an available lawn; if all the Young People's meetings through July and August are held under the sky. Jesus' ministry was largely in the outdoors. His meeting with his first disciples was on the shore of Jordan. His ministry for more than a year encircled the blue waters of the lake which has ever since been sacred to Christian hearts. Into the mountains which overlooked it he went often for those seasons of prayer which strengthened him for his task. On one of those green-carpeted slopes he delivered that "Sermon on the Mount," the greatest and the longest of his recorded discourses. On those slopes, within sight of Galilee, he twice fed the multitude. In the Gospels we see him often walking through the grain fields. In his parables we see again his love of nature exemplified in the use he made of nature's miracles to explain the miracles of grace. His favorite retreat when in Jerusalem was the garden in which at last he accepted the full cup of his Father's will. What wonder that the early Christians met in fields and sang their anthems under the stars? No building can hold the Christ. No altar is wide enough for the covering of his spirit. The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, and men are his, if they will be, and he is theirs. In woods and fields, in flowers, in all that lives, God's providence is manifest. Do you seek pleasure in the out-of-doors, or rest, or strength? Seek also God.

Lessons from Favorite Psalms

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Ps. 103:1-13

DAVID, many times a sinner and many times forgiven, gained through love of God and loyalty to him a glimpse of that Saviour who, following in his line, Son both of David and of God, should bring the world redemption. This psalm is of all psalms a psalm of the redeemed. It begins with praise and ends with praise. The benefits are listed progressively. A heart cleaned of sin is ready to dwell in a body healed of disease. With a heart and body purged, the life is surely free from destruction, and ready to be crowned with loving-kindness and to expect the tender mercies of God. To the sinner God is the embodiment of wrath, but this psalm carries a precious promise to the sinner, as it pictures the Lord slow to anger and plenteous in mercy, declaring, "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us." Throughout all the generations of men, this psalm has been the favorite of burdened souls, who have sought peace of mind, comfort in affliction, access to the Saviour. All these it gives, and it will have been best studied if through our reading of David's beautiful psalm we achieve closer touch with David's greater Son.

Books Worth While

Joan of Arc. By C. M. Stevens. Cupples & Leon Co., New York. $1.50.

UNDOUBTEDLY Joan of Arc is, of all the outstanding figures of history, the purest and the most free from any taint of selfishness. To this maiden only nineteen when her life ended, patriotism in the national sense of the word was a living, vivid part of religion, in which she had the same steadfast faith as she did in an ever-present God. Her career was marvelous beyond romance. The daughter of humble peasants, she alone in history held at seventeen the supreme command of all the military forces of a nation. In this office she succeeded in doing what Frenchman after Frenchman had vainly tried to do for a hundred years before her; she shook to its foundations the power of the invaders over her native land.

The active part of her wonderful life was very short. It was in May, 1428, that her "voices," as she called her mystic counselors, became insistent that "it was God who commands," and that she tried to send a message to the Dauphin of France that succor would come to him by Mid-Lent of the following year. It was in February of 1429 that she began her dangerous 450-mile journey, from Domremy in Alsace, across a country infested with roving robbers, guerrilla bands and freebooters as well as her country's enemies, toward Charles, protected only by Jean de Metz, a military adventurer, and six men of his band. It was on May 29, 1431, that French ecclesiastics condemned her to be burned as a heretic and turned her over to the English military authorities for the carrying out of this sentence. Two years and three months only, between her beginning and her end! But it may be doubted whether in so short a space of time any human personage has accomplished results which so powerfully influenced the course of history, not only of the day but of the succeeding centuries. That France became France, and did not remain an appendage of a foreign power, was Joan's achievement.

Mr. Stevens' book gives us in chronological order the main facts of the life of this wonderful girl. The author has carefully studied the original records and quotes them very freely, particularly as regards the most thrilling and interesting episodes, giving the very words of Joan herself and of other historical characters. The biographical part of the book is cleverly and fairly presented. Mr. Stevens, however, in attempting to attach a special meaning to Joan's career, which would appeal to Americans, has perhaps sometimes rather forced his deductions, particularly as regards Joan being a pioneer of the feminist and social movements of today. If so, certainly she was so unwittingly, as there is nothing in her own words which would lead us to believe that these now popular subjects of contemporary thought had even entered her mind.

The press work of this volume is unusually good—a real merit, in these days of hurried bookmaking.

The Rich Man's Poverty and the Poor Man's Wealth, and Other Practical Talks. By Rev. George Thomas Dowling, D. D., New York Churchman Company. $1.00.

THIS little book contains some twenty-five short talks on various everyday subjects, such as "Does the World Owe You a Living?" "The Creed of the Thriftless," "The Possible Glory of Obscure Lives." Dr. Dowling has the rather rare gift of combining conciseness with good, hard common sense, occasionally illumined with a bit of kindly humor. Good advice is proverbially hard to take, but the good advice given in these talks is palatable and attractive, as well as forcible and sometimes comforting. A careful reading of this book would be a good stimulus for most people.

The Coming Golden Age. By Frank Rosewater. Published by the Author. New York City. $1.

THIS is a book which promises a heaven upon earth, on condition that the author's solutions of the social problems of the world be adopted in their entirety. These solutions are rather radical, and involve the practical abolition of the entire existing economic systems of production and distribution, and the substitution of a creation of Mr. Rosewater's brain. Certain phases of this proposed new system are being now tried out in Russia, and it would perhaps be as well to wait until the results in that country have developed, before adopting the system as a whole, merely on faith in its inventor's promises. The volume appeals chiefly to the student of political and economic theories.

The Acme of Camping Comfort

SINCE we introduced the Wilson Roll-A-Bed Tent, about a month ago, it has met with instantaneous approval by campers and motorists everywhere.

The Roll-A-Bed Tent is a folding top, bedding roll and a tent all in one. It can be set up anywhere in a few minutes and can be as quickly rolled up, and carried on the Automobile running board, in the Canoe; or easily transported in any manner.

Like everything else, in the Wilson "REST-GOOD" line of Military and Camp Equipment, the desirability, convenience and comfort of this new idea is the talk of the country. The response that we have already had is proof of its satisfaction.

We are illustrating here a few of the many other Camp necessities that we make for Campers and Tourists. Ask your dealer for them.

Questions and Answers

J. K., Lanark, Ill. Believing in the Bible and being sorry for one's sins are not sufficient to secure salvation. We must repent of our sin and go in prayer to God, beseeching him for his dear Son's sake to pardon us, implicitly believing in Christ as our all-sufficient Saviour. No one, however he may have sinned, who thus repents and in full sincerity asks for pardon, will be sent away unforgiven. Then he must live as a pardoned man ought to live. He must entreat God to renew his heart and to give him the Holy Spirit, that he may hate sin and resolutely turn from it. If he is sincere throughout, he will be so filled with love and gratitude for God's pardon that he will fear to offend him again and will desire holiness as the highest attainable good.

Reader, Deposit, N. Y. The Jews are the descendants of the people of the southern kingdom, of which Judah was the chief tribe. The Israelites were the people of the northern kingdom. The separation of the kingdom is described in 1 Kings 12 and 11 Chron. 10. The people of Israel were absorbed in the surrounding nations and are consequently lost.

L. B., Manchester, N. H. There is no record of Paul's life in Arabia in Acts. The visit probably took place soon after his conversion. It is improbable that the three years which elapsed between his conversion and the beginning of his great work of preaching were spent in Damascus. His change from being a persecutor to an advocate of Christianity was so radical that he felt the need of seclusion that he might think out his new position. He may have gone to Arabia for that purpose.

S. T., Tennessee. What does the psalmist mean by the swallow building a nest on the altar (Ps. 84 : 3)?

Two explanations are possible: one is that a custom which existed among several nations of antiquity may have been observed by the Jews, of never disturbing the nests of birds which were built within or without the temples. They were regarded as under divine protection. The other and more probable explanation is that one line of the beautiful psalm is lost. The psalmist's meaning evidently was that as the sparrow had found a house and the swallow a nest where safety was assured, so he had found such a resting-place, "even thy altars."

J. D. P., Brooklyn, N. Y. Please explain John 7 : 39.

There is no doubt that the Holy Spirit operated in the world in various ways prior to Christ's coming. In the Old Testament mention is made of him. See Gen. 6 : 3; Isa. 34 : 16; 48 : 16. John's remark is explanatory of that which Christ made, but which had been misunderstood. He was speaking of the Pentecostal descent of the Spirit (Acts. 2 : 1-4), which gave special miraculous powers for the work that lay before the apostles; also probably of that indwelling of the Spirit, which before had been occasional, but was now to be the privilege of every believer who sought in the way prescribed.

Rev. C. W. T., Hancock, Md. 1. No. 2. There is no doubt of the assurance of heavenly recognition of our departed friends with each other. The Old and the New Testament have passages dealing with the subject. David said of his dead son: "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me" (1 Sam. 12 : 23). See also the parable of Dives and Lazarus, the promise to the thief on the cross, and Phil. 3 : 20; Heb. 12 : 1; Matt. 17 : 3; Rev. 6 : 9; Rom. 14 : 12; Luke 16 : 23; 1 Thess. 4 : 13-18. We have no reason to doubt that the redeemed will know each other, and that friendships begun on earth will there be perfected. Heaven is the Christian's fatherland, where we shall see our friends and know them.

E. J. C., Alma Center, Wis. The Easter festival derives its name from the goddess Ostara—in Anglo-Saxon, Eastre—which the Saxons of old were wont to celebrate about the same season at which the Christian festival of Easter occurs. Ostara, or Eastre, seems to have been the personification of the morning or East, and also of the opening year or spring. What with the pagans was joy at the rising of the natural sun and the awakening of nature from the death of winter, with us Christians becomes joy at the rising of the Sun of Righteousness—the resurrection of Christ from the grave. There is little doubt that the use of eggs at this season was originally symbolical of the revivification of nature—the renewal of life in spring. The Jews used eggs in the feast of Passover, and the Persians, when they keep the festival of the solar new year (in March), present each other with colored eggs.

M. E. E., Colo. The ordinary study or criticism is directed to finding out the meaning of passages in the Bible, their correct translation, and their significance and bearing on doctrine. The higher criticism goes above and back of all that, applying to the books of the Bible the same tests and methods of examination as are applied to other ancient books. The destructive higher critics do not approach the Book of all books as faithful, trusting children of a great Master and Teacher, but as scientific distorters of truths and revelations. With German science as the lever, the bane of this class of criticism has reached out to many great schools and has done much harm.

J. B. W., Caldwell, Idaho. The passage in Hosea is descriptive of the punishment of Israel for its lusts and idolatry, and further descriptions of their coming into their own again, when they will have recognized and accepted their Messiah.

Miss E. F. Hawkinsville, Ga. The Huns were of Asiatic origin, in all probability of Mongolian or Tartar stock. Their arch-enemies were the Goths. With Attila's death, 454 A. D., the power of the Huns was broken. The Germans were found by the Roman consul Papirius occupying a part of Germania and Belgium in 113 B. C.

Mrs. E. M. B., Emory, Va. The appellation "Jew" is derived from the patriarch Judah and was originally applied to all members of that tribe, and also to subjects of the separate kingdom of Judah in contradistinction to the seceding ten tribes, who retained the name of Israelites. The name Hebrew is derived from Heber or Eber, meaning "from the other side," or an immigrant. Heber was the son of Salah and the father of Peleg (Sec Gen. 10 : 24 ; 11 : 14). Abram was the first to be called a Hebrew, probably in the immigrant sense. The name is seldom used of the Israelites in the Old Testament, except when the speaker is a foreigner, or when the Israelites speak of themselves to one of another nation.

W. W., Bardolph, Ill. In John 10 : 29, 30, our Lord says of his sheep: "My Father, which hath given them me, is greater than all; and no one is able to pluck out of the Father's hand." The Father who has given will maintain the gift. He will not allow anything to interfere with his will. Safe in the arms of Jesus and of his Almighty Father—that is the sheep's blessed heritage.

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

A Co-ordinated, Constructive Teaching
Being the Addresses Delivered at the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference,
May 28-30, 1918

THE Conference of eminent Bible Teachers and Authorities on Prophetic Interpretation in the United States and Canada, held at Philadelphia May 28th to 30th, 1918, was the most notable and authoritative gathering of its kind ever held in this country. The finest consecrated scholarship of all the Christian denominations was represented, and the deliberations and addresses on "The Return of Our Lord and Related Events" possess a vital spiritual interest to Christian men and women throughout the world. In view of the extraordinary manifestations of interest in the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference, an arrangement was made for the publication by the Christian Herald of the proceedings and addresses of the Conference in a volume entitled "Light on Prophecy."

"Light on Prophecy" is published under the special supervision of the Committee of the Conference, and is the only volume to receive official authorization. The book is of 300 pages, containing all the addresses, about twenty in number.

Notable Speakers and Addresses

Below is a List of the Addresses Which Are Included in "Light on Prophecy"

- "Hath God Spoken?" and "What is to Become of the Church?" By Dr. Harris H. Gregg, Pastor of Winnipeg, Canada, an eminent Canadian Divine.
- "What Is Prophecy?" and "Where Is Christ Now and What Is He Doing?" By Rev. John M. McInnes, of Syracuse, Secretary of the Montrose Bible Conference.
- "The Doctrine of Our Lord's Return" By Dr. Mark A. Matthews, Former Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church.
- "The Answer to the Greatest Question Jesus Ever Asked," and "What Manner of Persons Ought We to Be?" By Dr. William B. Riley, of the First Baptist Church of Minneapolis, Minn., and President of the Northwest Bible School, Bible teacher and lecturer.
- "The Coming Glory" and "Did the Cross of Christ Fulfill All the Promises?" By W. L. Pettingill, Dean of the Philadelphia School of the Bible.
- "God's Purpose in This Dispensation" and "Regathering of Israel in Unbelief" By Dr. James M. Gray, of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, Ill.
- "The Capture of Jerusalem" By Rev. A. E. Thompson, A.B., Pastor of the American Church at Jerusalem.
- "War on German Theology" By Dr. Cortland Myers, Pastor of the Tremont Baptist Temple, Boston, Mass.
- "Coming Events Cast Their Shadows" and "Will There Be Any Tears in Heaven and Why?" By Rev. P. W. Philpott, Hamilton, Canada.
- "Has God a Program?" By Rev. B. B. Sutcliffe.
- "Does This Truth Paralyze or Energize?" By Rev. Herbert Mackenzie, Pastor of the Gospel Church, Cleveland, Ohio, and Secretary of the Erieside Bible Conference.

Mistakes Parents Make

—How To Avoid Them

New Methods in Child Training Fast Superseding the Old Highest Authorities Endorse Them

Being a good parent is the biggest job on earth. Upon how we train our children depends their entire future success and happiness.

Yet what training have most of us had in this all-important work? Instead of using scientific methods in our contact with the most delicate mechanism in the world—a child's mind—we often use methods that do irreparable injury.

What chance would a fine Swiss watch have if, knowing nothing about watchmaking, we tried to adjust it with a hatchet and a crowbar?

As absurd as that may seem, thousands of loving parents with their whole beings wrapped up in their children's welfare are using methods fully as unsuited—fully as dangerous and harmful.

For a child's mind needs far more intelligent care than the most delicate watch ever made. And very often the method we use to correct one bad habit is the very cause of other bad habits which can easily wreck the entire life of the child.

Where We Go Wrong

The trouble in the past has been that when a child is disobedient, untruthful or "naughty," we punish the child for exhibiting that symptom. What we should do is to attack the cause. Not by punishment, but by co-operation.

When we attack the symptoms instead of the cause, we very often irritate the cause instead of removing it.

Millions of children are deceitful because the parents in trying to overcome some other bad habit have caused them to be deceitful.

Who Is To Blame?

When a child is straightforward, obedient and willing—when it is courageous, generous and fine in every way, it is that way because the parent made it so. And the reverse is equally true. When a child is untruthful, selfish and disobedient, it is not the fault of the child but of the parent.

You can make your children what you will. Character is nothing more than a set of established habits. Whether these habits are good or bad depends on the parent.

The parent has no one but himself to blame for the conduct of his offspring, not only when young, but throughout life.

No Help Until Now

Until now parents have had to grope around as best they could. They have had to depend on self devised methods. It is a wonderful commentary on the intelligence of the average parent that they have done as well as they have.

But now, for the first time, there is constructive help at hand. A great organization, the Parents to instruct children in the delicate matters of sex?

DO YOU KNOW HOW—

to always obtain cheerful obedience?
to correct mistakes of early training?
to keep child from crying?
to develop initiative in child?
to teach child instantly to comply with command "Don't touch"?
to suppress temper in children without punishment?
to succeed with child of any age without display of authority?
to discourage the "Why" habit in regard to commands?
to prevent quarreling and fighting?

to cure impertinence? Discourtesy? Vulgarly?
to remove fear of darkness? Fear of thunder and lightning? Fear of harmless animals?
to encourage child to talk?
to teach punctuality? Perseverance? Carefulness?
to overcome obstinacy?
to cultivate mental concentration?
to teach honesty and truthfulness?

These are only a few of the hundreds of questions fully answered and explained, in a way that makes application of the principles involved easy through this course.

Association, an international society with members in all parts of the world, has been formed to guide parents in the upbringing of their children.

The principle upon which this association was founded is that in dealing with children confidence is the basis of control.

Professor Ray C. Beery, A.B., M.A. (Harvard and Columbia), the founder of the Association, after years of exhaustive research and practical experience, has created a complete Course in Child Training, endorsed by leading educators everywhere, which is available to members of the Association.

This course is unlike anything that has ever gone before. Instead of dealing in generalities, it is intensely definite and practical, and tells the parent exactly what to do in each individual case to produce immediate and permanent results. It is meant for the modern busy parent of children from the cradle to 18 years of age.

The "Case" Method

The method used by Professor Beery in his Course in Child Training is essentially the same as that now used in teaching the law, except, of course, that it is condensed and remarkably easy to apply.

Instead of devoting pages to a theoretical discussion of the various traits and habits which are to be cured, Professor Beery shows in each instance exactly how some other parent in the same situation has applied his methods to secure results.

For instance, suppose your child is aged four, and is afraid of the dark. All you have to do is look up this trait in the index for children of that age and then turn to the proper page. Here you will find in detail an example of how some other parent cured a child of this fear through Professor Beery's methods. No other teacher of child training has ever attempted to handle the subject in such a practical, easy to apply way. It means that in addition to a constructive, thoroughly organized system of child training, you have the daily help you need to overcome all undesirable characteristics as they develop.

Personal Service

In addition to the complete Course in Child Training, by Professor Beery, members of the Parents Association enjoy many other equally worth-while benefits such as the privilege of personal consultation through the mail with Professor Beery on any particularly vexing child training problem, exchange of experiences of other members through the Association's Bulletin which is issued regularly; free Purchase Service, which enables you to buy children's books at publisher's prices, advice as to schools, camps, etc. But we have not the space here to give the whole wonderful story.

Free Book Explains All

"New Methods in Child Training" is the title of a 24-page illustrated booklet which describes the work of the Association and explains Professor Beery's remarkable Course in Child Training. It also contains letters from members outlining the astonishingly satisfactory results they have secured through these New Methods. A copy of this book will be sent at once to any interested parent who merely writes a letter or postcard; or, mail the coupon below. It is suggested that you write at once, as the Association is making a special offer to new members which will undoubtedly be withdrawn shortly. Send today—no obligation.

Questions and Answers

MISS GILLA BOREN, Texas, in a letter to the United States Food Administration writes: "I am a little farmer girl, so you see I am helping produce food for our brave lads in France as well as at home. My sister and I get right out in the field and plow as well as men and we are not ashamed of it. I for one am pleased to get a chance to try to help our country by eating corn bread and leaving the wheat to be sent to France for those brave, suffering people. I am ready and willing to do anything to help, even to fighting the Kaiser's men myself; but as there is no chance for such pleasure, I will do my bit at home. My sister Birdie and I want to plant, thresh and deliver at our station, free of charge to the government, one acre of the finest grain our land will produce. We've been thinking of making an appeal to every man in our county to do the same, for I'm sure it would lighten the hearts of many people to get to do this, for this 'little old Texas' is filled with patriotism."

Mr. Hoover answered as follows: "I was greatly pleased to receive your letter bringing to me a message of true American patriotism. The service that both you and your sister are rendering to our country is a worthy expression of what the womanhood of our land are doing and will continue to do throughout the world crisis. You are rendering effective help to our Army, our Navy, and the Allies by helping to fortify them with food. The government cannot accept your liberal offer to give, free of charge, an acre of grain threshed and delivered at the station, but perhaps I can offer a suggestion: Why not invest the money received from this acre in War Savings Stamps, or other government security? This will not only help the government, but at the same time it will be a very good investment, and your grain will have reached the markets through which it can be best distributed, where it will do the greatest good." Doubtless there are many others who will be willing to follow this Texas girl's example. We would be glad to hear from them.

J. C. McK., London, Ky. Though the passage you quote has been held to have no direct bearing on the subject of degrees in heaven, the inference is open that as one star differs from another in brilliancy, and one body from another, so hereafter there will be a difference in degrees in the future life.

S. E. T. I have been interested in prophecy for seventy-five years. I cannot reconcile a portion of the teaching of some of these writers (on prophecy) with the New Testament, particularly on the Jewish question and probation after the Advent. Many, depending on a second chance set forth by these distinguished men, may be forever lost.

This correspondent is somewhat mixed up on the matter. Dr. Gray, to whom his letter has been referred, writes: "The second probation heresy refers to a chance after death; but the nations on the earth after the Advent are composed of men who have not died as yet. The Gospel of the Kingdom will be proclaimed to them, and they may enter in if they will. There is no danger in that teaching, as it is the same principle as we are teaching now. 'Whosoever will may come.' But if they die in rejection of Christ it is different. No probation then."

J. McC., Stuyvesant, N. Y. By the word "Church," in its broad sense, we are not to understand the buildings of stone or wood which we are accustomed to call churches, but the congregation of those who make up the members of the Kingdom of Christ, who adhere to the Word of God and his teachings, and are built up thereby in the true faith unto eternal life (Eph. 2:19-22). No one can see the world of the despotism, tyranny and oppression that cause wars. As Israel bowed its head and humbled itself before God on entering a battle, so should we, and then fight "the good fight" with all our might. Let us remember at all times that as we can come to God in all things as little children to their father, so we can lay this war, with all it implies, implicitly and trustingly before our Father at the mercy seat.

Miss E. C., Dundan, Ariz. The Red Cross is nonsectarian and includes men and women of all creeds and beliefs. Hence it cannot be governed by the dictates of any one church or body. If, in furtherance of a desire to help the plans, none of which, however, are for God and eternity. Even from them, selfish and worldly as they are, the children of light can learn the lesson of concentration—not in relation to worldly things, however, but in spiritual things. The Revised Version renders verse 9, "Make to yourself friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness," implying that they, "the children of light," should use money, not as the unjust steward did, for selfish purposes, but in doing good to others (see Luke 6:38; Matt. 25:34-40). 3. I Cor. 15:31 is a reference to the constant peril that encompassed the apostle because of his religious belief and his efforts as a preacher. 4. In II Cor. 4:10, Paul conveys a similar thought to that in I Cor. 15:31, and says that, though dying daily, the true believer lives, and thus experiences the power of Christ's resurrection as a prelude to that glorious time when he will be raised up with Christ to live eternally.

W. R., Montpelier, Vt. The first thing I turn to in my Christian Herald is the sermon page. As an unbiased layman I heartily appreciate the broad evangelical teaching of the sermons you print, and regard them as the best of their kind. Then their timeliness and applicability to the spirit and movement of the age we live in specially please me. Your contributors are live pastors, with a Gospel that is never dull nor out of date but always suited to the need and dealing with the great events that are uppermost in men's minds. Why is it that with the whole world on fire we find so many preachers who give us, instead of good, strengthening Gospel sermons, discourses that are essays on philosophic piffle or that thrash out texts already worn threadbare while the hearers are looking for some message full of Christian courage and inspiration for these terrible days we are living in? It is time the pulpit woke up to the greatest opportunity it has ever known. I am glad to see that the Herald is showing the way. The Church should join the conservation movement by giving us its best spiritual output these days. Then there would be no complaint of small audiences.

Our observation leads us to conclude that the Church is waking up to a full realization of its opportunities. There may be here and there an exception, but they are becoming very few. The Gospel applied to the daily needs of life is being preached more widely than ever before. The rigid lines of division are fast disappearing.

Mrs. W. K. K., Florida. 1. The humiliation of Jesus is that state in which he did not employ his divine majesty and power, but in his human nature, for our sakes, freely and deeply humbled himself, so that in such humiliation he might redeem us by his obedience and suffering. Having become in all things as we are, yet without sin, it was fitting that he should lift up his eyes, heart and voice to Him who alone can help. 2. The paragraph dealing with the narrow way and the broad way, the one to life, the other to destruction (Matt. 7:13) show that the requirements of the law and prophets were far beyond the narrow morality of the scribes and Pharisees, and therefore men might be tempted to seek the easier way of careless living. Christ warns his hearers to begin here to get into the right gate, the one which, through self-denial, repentance, faith and poverty of spirit, leads to a glorious end. It is harder to find than the other, but it leads to a better end. As we cannot know what God knows, we do not know how many who travel the hard way will finally be lost. The wisdom and mercy of God are great and far-reaching.

This letter, from H. S., Rosser, N. Y., is an illustration of real giving: "I send $100 from limited means. Use it either to give a ten days' outing for some poor child, or send to the starving Armenian children. Use your own judgment, only I wish it were more. I am old, not able to earn, and homeless myself, but will spare this mite with the earnest prayer that it may save both soul and body. I was tempted to use the money to help buy books offered by the Christian Herald, but think I can deny myself for the sake of the destitute children." The gift will be devoted to the Armenian sufferers. May it be blessed to both the giver and the receiver.

W. A. O., Pittsfield, N. H. The whole theory of the atonement is typified by "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world." Christ is likened to the lamb of the Old Testament, whose blood had to be spilled before sins could be forgiven and forgotten by God. So also with Christ. The wrath of God against the sins of humanity was appeased by the shedding of the blood of his Lamb, his only Son.

A bit of sandy hillside beneath a summer sky,
A breeze that sobs a love-song, and flutters softly by;
A glimpse of sunlit river swift moving to the sea,

And clouds that hold the terror of storms that are to be—
Slim trees with leaves aqiver, that stand serenely high, into the heart or know infallibly who among those that are found in the congregations possess true faith in Christ and are thus living members of the true Church. Our creeds explain the word "Church" by calling it "a communion of saints," that is, an assembly in which there are none but saints—a holy assembly. The wicked and ungodly, though they may have fellowship with the true Church in external signs, in names and offices, have no true part in it if they have not a share in the gifts of the Holy Spirit, and faith in the heart.
And memory's slender fingers that touch the soul of me.

C. E. C., Mount Pleasant, Ga. The Testaments sent to the soldiers are read very generally, as letters from the camps clearly show. As the chaplains, pastors, evangelists and Y. M. C. A. workers are active in all the camps, the men have ample opportunity for talking with them, and discussing any difficult passages.

L. C. G., St. Marys, Ga. There have been wars from the beginning of things, and as God has ruled through them all, so he is ruling today. What his divine purpose, laid in wisdom and mercy, is we will know hereafter. On our knees in prayer, we can but follow Christ's example in Gethsemane: "Not as I will, but as thou wilt," and we can know with certainty, as he did, that the cup will pass some time and all will again be well. Having the consciousness of a just cause and knowing the necessity for the success of righteousness we can pray for victory with assurance—such a glorious victory as will once and for all rid

Red Cross, some people give a public entertainment, we cannot deny them that right, even though we may not share in it.

W. J. C., Santa Maria, Calif. The writer in Ecclesiastes uses the bold contrasts so common to the Jewish rhetoric. From the standpoint of the believer, the day of death is better than the day of one's birth. On the believer's death he will have "overcome," he will be through with suffering, sorrow, disappointment, anxiety and vexations. He will have succeeded to his final blessed inheritance. Further, his sorrow and suffering having been all for a purpose—that of preparing his soul and cleansing it—the statement that sorrow is better than laughter is correct in the sense he intended to convey.

Mrs. L. O., Fairland, Okla. 1. In Matt. 5:25, our Lord is pointing out that the skill and judgment that mark a prudent course in worldly affairs might be justifiably applied in spiritual affairs. Thus, when one is on the way to court with his adversary, it is wise to attempt a settlement—a reconciliation—lest, if he loses his suit, he may be severely punished. So also, in spiritual affairs, reconciliation with an offended brother in this life is absolutely necessary before his wrong cries out against us to the great Judge, and we come under condemnation. 2. In Luke 16:9 we are reminded how worldly people in their generation, and for their own selfish purposes, are prudent and sagacious in a worldly sense and show energy and determination in carrying out mercenary

© Committee on Public Information

NEVER since the old bell in Philadelphia rang out the first full notes of American Liberty has the anniversary of that day of great decisions, of that setting of the capstone of human rights upon the structure of freedom, been so widely celebrated; never has its significance to the world been so widely recognized as on July 4, 1918, when America's National Day was celebrated as a holiday in every corner of the globe not under Teuton control. In Chile, in Australia, in Cuba, in Uruguay, in Brazil, in England, in France, and in Italy, special observances of the day were organized. The Fourth was made a legal holiday in France and in every city and village the flags flew for America. In England and Scotland extensive programs were planned. Great demonstrations of the foreign-born citizens were given in Washington and New York and other cities, it being especially fitting that on the day, when America's independence was declared, those who had found freedom from tyranny under the flag should formally declare the firm allegiance of their hearts to the Nation's plans and purposes.

AT Mount Vernon 10,000 people, including the members of the Diplomatic Corps, gathered about the tomb of Washington to hear the address of the President, who leads the world today, as Washington in 1776 led this infant nation. Shortly after three o'clock the Mayflower dropped anchor in the Potomac, opposite Mount Vernon. She carried the President, Lord Reading of England's High Commission, the Secretary of State, the Postmaster-General, the Attorney-General and representatives of thirty-three nationalities, who brought wreaths to be placed on Washington's tomb. After a simple program, in which John MacCormack, the famous tenor, led the singing of the "Star

Many Nations Honor the Fourth

President Wilson's Great Speech at Washington's Tomb Sets Afresh the World's Goals of Liberty

Spangled Banner," the President spoke as follows:

"Gentlemen of the Diplomatic Corps and My Fellow-Citizens: I am happy to draw apart with you to this quiet place of old counsel in order to speak a little of the meaning of this day of our nation's independence. The place seems very still and remote. It is as serene and untouched by the hurry of the world as it was in those great days long ago when General Washington was here and held leisurely conference with the men who were to be associated with him in the creation of a nation. From these gentle slopes they looked out upon the world and saw it

It was a place of achievement. A great promise that was meant for all mankind was here given plan and reality. The associations by which we are here surrounded are the inspiring associations of that noble death which is only a glorious consummation. From this green hillside we also ought to be able to see with comprehending eyes the world that lies around us and conceive anew the purpose that must set men free.

IT is significant—significant of their own character and purpose and of the influences they were setting afoot—that Washington and his associates, like the Barons at Runnymede, spoke and acted, not for a class, but for a people. It has been left for us to see to it that it shall be understood that they spoke and acted, not for a single people only, but for all mankind. They were thinking not of themselves and of the material interests which centered in the little groups of landholders and merchants and men of affairs with whom they were accustomed to act, in Virginia and the colonies to the north and south of her, but of a people which wished to be done with classes and special interests and the authority of men whom they had not themselves chosen to rule over them. They entertained no private purpose, desired no peculiar privilege. They were consciously planning that men of every class should be free and America a place to which men out of every nation might resort who wished to share with them the rights and privileges of free men. And we take our cue from them—do we not? We intend what they intended.

The Avenue du President Wilson in Paris

"We here in America believe our participation in this present war to be only the fruitage of what they planted. Our case differs from theirs only in this, that it is our inestimable privilege to concert with men out of every nation who shall make not only the liberties of America secure but the liberties of every other people as well. We are happy in the thought that we are permitted to do what they would have done had they been in our place. There must now be settled, once for all, what was settled for America in the great age upon which inspiration we draw today. This is surely a fitting place from which calmly to look out upon our task, that we may fortify our spirits for its accomplishment. And this is the appropriate place from which to avow, alike to the friends who look on and to the friends with whom we have the happiness to be associated in action, the faith and purpose with which we act.

"THIS, then, is our conception of the great struggle in which we are engaged. The plot is written plain upon every scene and every act of the supreme tragedy. On the one hand stand the peoples of the world—not only the peoples actually engaged, but many others, also, who suffer under mastery but cannot act; peoples of many races and in every part of the world—the people of stricken Russia still, among the rest, though they are for the moment unorganized and helpless.

"Opposed to them, masters of many armies, stand an isolated, friendless group of Governments, who speak no common purpose, but only selfish ambitions of their own, by which none can profit but themselves, and whose peoples are fuel in their hands. Governments which fear their people, and yet are for the time being sovereign lords, making every choice for them and disposing of their lives and fortunes as they will, as well as of the lives and fortunes of every people who fall under their power—Governments clothed with the strange trappings and the primitive authority of an age that is altogether alien and hostile to our own. The Past and the Present are in deadly grapple, and the peoples of the world are being done to death between them.

"THERE can be but one issue. The settlement must be final. There can be no compromise. No half-way decision would be tolerable. No half-way decision is conceivable. These are the ends for which the associated peoples of the world are fighting and which must be conceded them before there can be peace:

"I.—The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world; or, if it cannot be presently destroyed, at the least its reduction to virtual impotence.

"II.—The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery.

"III.—The consent of all nations to be governed in their conduct toward each other by the same principles of honor and of respect for the common law of civilized society that govern the individual citizens of all modern states in their relations with one another; to the end that all promises and covenants may be sacredly observed, no private plots or conspiracies hatched, no selfish injuries wrought with impunity, and a mutual trust established upon the handsome foundation of a mutual respect for right.

"IV.—The establishment of an organization of peace which shall make it certain that the combined power of free nations will check every invasion of right and serve to make peace and justice the more secure by affording a definite tribunal of opinion to which all must submit and by which every international readjustment that cannot be amicably agreed upon by the peoples directly concerned shall be sanctioned.

"THESE great objects can be put into a single sentence. What we seek is the reign of law, based upon the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind.

"These great ends cannot be achieved by debating and seeking to reconcile and accommodate what statesmen may wish with their projects for balances of power and of national opportunity. They can be realized only by the determination of what the thinking peoples of the world desire, with their longing hope for justice and for social freedom and opportunity.

"I can fancy that the air of this place carries the accents of such principles with a peculiar kindness. Here were started forces which the great nation against which they were primarily directed at first regarded as a revolt against its rightful authority, but which it has long since seen to have been a step in the liberation of its own people as well of the people of the United States; and I stand here now to speak—speak proudly and with confident hope—of the spread of this revolt, this liberation, to the great stage of the world itself! The blinded rulers of Prussia have roused forces they knew little of—forces which, once roused, can never be crushed to earth again; for they have at their heart an inspiration and a purpose which are deathless and of the very stuff of triumph!"

IN New York City, a parade of 70,000 to 75,000 marchers with 125 bands and 150 floats swept up Fifth Avenue, starting at 8.43 o'clock from Washington Square and continuing for ten hours. This parade was in two sections. The first was a summary of America's fighting strength and that of her Allies, the second was the division of nationalities in which marched America's adopted sons and daughters from every corner of the globe, marching in national groups with flags of their birth, doing homage to Old Glory.

IN London and throughout England, American flags were flown everywhere. In the Central Hall at Westminster, an Anglo-Saxon fellowship meeting brought British and Americans together to proclaim their unity of sentiment and resolution. Viscount Bryce presided and Winston Churchill was the principal speaker, although Admiral Sims and Major George Haven Putnam also spoke, and the famous band of the Coldstream Guards played the "Star Spangled Banner." Mr. Churchill brought the audience to its feet in a burst of American applause and British "Hear, hears!" when he expressed the conviction that the ideals of the Allies were in harmony with the principles of the American Declaration of Independence, and that not only English, but Canadian, Australian, New Zealand, and Indian hearts beat in sympathy with America. Major Putnam raised the enthusiasm to high pitch by declaring "What God joined together no power of Germany can ever put asunder."

Admiral Sims told how Allied naval teamwork had conquered the submarines which were now being sunk faster than they could be built, while merchant tonnage was being built faster than the remaining submarines could sink it. The Admiral said that America had 250 ships with 3,000 officers, and 40,000 men serving in European waters from the Adriatic to the White Sea.

Immense crowds acclaimed America's fête day in Paris, where the celebration centered about the renaming of the "Avenue le Trocadero" as "Avenue du President Wilson." Wherever American troops were quartered in France, England or Italy, the Fourth was celebrated by old and young with full enthusiasm.

THE American advances through Belleau Wood to the heights commanding Belleau and Torcy left a pointed salient, projecting into the American and French lines, between Belleau and Chateau Thierry. Near the base of the salient lay the little town of Vaux, back of which rose a wooded hill. On the morning of July 1, American artillery, which in this sector is completely supplied with American guns and American shells, was ready to drive the Germans out of Vaux. By noon every house in Vaux had been hit at least once, while American aviators kept the sky clear of enemy machines. Promptly at 6 p. m. the American infantry started in skirmish formation, across the wheat fields. At 6.25 Vaux was in American hands. In 15 minutes more the men had gone through the woods behind the village, and by 7.30 the Red Cross ambulances were running into the wrecked town. The Americans captured nearly 500 men. The depth of the advance from the point of the original salient was about a mile and a quarter, and the width of the front attacked was about four miles. The French operating on the right of the Americans, at the same time, took Hill 204, east of Vaux, which dominates the approaches to Chateau Thierry. A determined counter-attack by the Germans, west of Hill 204, on the following day cost them the practical annihilation of a regiment. At 1 a. m. on July 3, the Germans attempted to retake Vaux, but failed.

MAYOR MITCHEL KILLED. Major John Purroy Mitchel, fusion Mayor of New York who entered the aviation service in January, fell 500 feet to his death from a bombing plane, at Gerstner Field near Lake Charles, La., on July 6. Major Mitchel had about completed training and expected soon to be in France. His plane came down some distance from the body and the cause of the accident could not be determined. The body was brought to New York City where it lay in state in the City Hall and was buried with military honors.

Americans Take Men and Ground

Among the pallbearers were Theodore Roosevelt, Cleveland H. Dodge, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, George W. Wickersham, Jacob H. Schiff and Frank L. Polk. Major Mitchel was born in New York, in 1879. He began the practice of law in 1901. He entered public life in 1906, when he accepted the thankless and dangerous task of investigating departments of the City Government, suspected of irregularities. His fair, fearless and efficient work brought him the Borough Presidency of Manhattan, followed by the Presidency of the Board of Aldermen. He resigned to become collector of the port, but was elected mayor by the fusion committee of 107 in 1913. He was defeated for reelection last fall and at once prepared to enter the military service.

BATTLE CELEBRATES THE FOURTH. Australian troops, with whom some units of Americans were fighting, attacked on July 4 the German positions east of Amiens, north and south of the Somme. The attack was made behind a smoke screen without previous artillery preparation, with tanks leading, and was a complete surprise to the Germans, who surrendered in large numbers almost without resistance. South of the river positions along a four-mile front for a depth of one-and-a-half miles, including the village of Hamel and the positions beyond it, were lost by the Germans, while north of the river the Austrians advanced 500 yards on a front of 1,200 yards. The American battle-cry was "Lusitania." The prisoners taken numbered over 1,500. The usual German counter-attack failed completely.

A BIG SELASH. According to the plans, 95 merchant ships and transports, totaling 474,464 tons, carried into the sea on July 4 America's defiance to the submarine. In addition to the commercial ships, fourteen destroyers, one gunboat and two small naval vessels were sent into the water.

HOME RULE FOR INDIA. A commission which had been studying the governmental problems of India for a number of months completed its report at Simla April 22. The report was made public on July 5. It recommends limited Home Rule.

ITALY HOLDS OFFENSIVE. Italian troops, with their French and British Allies, attacked Austrian positions on the Asiago plateau, northwest of Bassano, on June 29 and 30. In two days of bitter fighting Monte de Valbello, the Col del Rosso, and the Col de Chele were captured with 4 guns, 15 trench mortars, 57 machine-guns, and several rifles, and more than 800 prisoners. The capture of these heights completely restored the Italian lines as they existed in this sector prior to the Austrian offensive of June 15. On July 2 the Italians advanced north of Monte Grappa, capturing important positions with about 600 prisoners, machine-guns and 4 small trench cannon. On July 2 the Italians drove the Austrians back along the Lower Piave, east of Capo Sile, capturing 1,900 prisoners and much material. On July 6 the Italians completed the task of driving the Austrians back across the new Piave near the sea.

PROFITEERS EXPOSED. The Federal Trade Commission, on June 29, in a report to the Senate, gave details of what they described as outrageous profiteering. They charged the great packing houses, the shoe industry, the flour millers, the canners, some metal industries and lumber interests with profiteering of various degrees. In the case of the packing houses the Board charged that profits had increased for Armour from 6 2-10 in 1912-13-14 to 27 1-10 in 1917; for Swift from 8 3-10 to 47 2-10; for Morris from 6 8-10 to 263 7-10; while independent packers had made higher profits than the larger companies. Armour & Co., Swift & Co. and Morris & Co. immediately issued statements. Armour & Co. said that according to Government audit their profit was 1/4 of a cent on each pound of their product; Morris & Co. declared that the profit of 263 7-10 per cent. was figured as against the capital stock of $3,000,000, whereas the actual investment in the business in 1917 was $38,000,000, on which their profit was 14 1/4 per cent.; Swift & Co. admitted profits had been greater during the last two or three years, but declared that most of these profits had been put back in the business to enable the plants to meet the excessive demands made upon them by the War conditions. The Board accused the flour millers of Minneapolis of having exceeded the

The Czecho-Slovaks of Siberia

THE Bolsheviki have been overthrown in all of eastern Siberia by the Czechs and Slovaks, who, hating Austrian and German tyranny, hate any one who submits to it. These Bohemian patriots and loyal Allies of Democracy may be the nucleus about which will gather the new army of the reconstituted eastern battle-front. Next week Maynard Owen Williams, who, while getting in and out of Russia, traveled with, ate with, and talked with these Czecho-Slovaks, will tell of the army which they planned to send to France.

Uncle Sam needs Chaplains. The churches supply the material and Major Pruden makes it into sky pilots. How he does it you will know next week.

Why should Christians study Prophecy? In the last of the present series of articles Dr. James M. Gray, next week, answers this most important question.

Next week also another of the series of modern fables by Miss Sangster and Robert Riggs depicts the punishment of the scoffer.

EVERYONE in the station paused to watch the children pass. I saw smiles; but I saw tears too. And something clutched at my own heart. For no one could look on those children unmoved. They were not the robust, well-fed, well-dressed children of our better homes; but mostly little puny, under-nourished, pale-faced folk of New York City's crowded East Side; poorly clad, big-eyed, eager-faced, hungry physically and mentally. They filled the car set aside for them until its sides seemed to bulge and its roof to lift. In some seats there would be five little adventurers who refused to be parted, despite discomfort.

Pretty soon the train started, and, leaving the city behind, with its heat and hardships, wound up the right bank of the Hudson River, through green-embowered towns. Whispers subsided. Restless children became still. Small faces were pressed to the windows.

Our train soon rushed into the station at Tarrytown. Here we were to leave the train for a ferry-boat. Here, more smiles greeted us, as—forming again—we gaily hurried, in a double line, down the long platform and across the railroad tracks and along the sidewalk for several blocks, to where the ferry-boat was waiting. Clamorous at the prospect of a sail across the river, we trooped on board; the ferry swung off, and soon we were out on the water. At Nyack—across the river—we docked again; and here two big stages awaited us. The boys piled into one—an auto bus; and steamed off up the road. The girls clambered into the other—a two-horse vehicle; the good-natured old driver gathered up his reins, clucked to his fat horses, and soon we had left the town and were rolling along a green, woody road. Presently we turned from the main road, into that which led to Mont-Lawn. The vehicles climbed upward through sloping meadows starred with daisies, made a turn or two through a bit of woods, and came in sight of The Christian Herald Children's Home.

Surprised at the extent and beauty of the place, I could not wonder that the little folk at my side were round-eyed and amazed. For even to me, a grown-up, the place was a fairyland. A miracle of terraced lawns, artistic buildings, bright flowers; sun-splashed brick paths and lovely old maples—it rose before us like a dream. Far below us, visible over green tree-tops, swept the broad, blue Hudson; while behind and around Mont-Lawn were intensely green, tree-coated hills.

"Come, children! You hop out here!"

IT was the voice of Miss Goering, the Home's Superintendent, greeting us. She stood smiling up at us from the porch of the bath-house, before which our wagon had drawn up. Coming forward pleasantly, but with an air of quiet authority that the children instantly respected, she supervised the unloading, and all that came after in a way that accounted for the efficient management apparent in every detail of the life at Mont-Lawn.

I looked on, while the little girls, undressing and bundling themselves up in huge bath towels, waited, in a row, for their physical examination. The doctor took them one by one, handling each deftly and gently. She looked on these little guests as though they might have been especial friends rather than patients, and the children seemed to feel it. Pretty soon all were through—then came the splashing under the big shower bath. From this purification there emerged the rosiest, sweetest, cleanest lot of little girls, clad in Mont-Lawn frocks until their own clothes and sacks should have been thoroughly fumigated and sterilized, that it has ever been my joy to see.

While they tumbled about on the grass, I saw something of the rest of Mont-Lawn; the beautiful little chapel with its stained-glass windows showing Jesus among little children; the row of cottage-dormitories; the playgrounds; the long, pretty glassed-in dining-room in "Fort Plenty," looking out over the Hudson, where the little folks eat; and lastly, the broad-verandaed "Homestead" or headquarters of the Superintendent and her staff.

Towards supper-time, I wandered down to the lawn where the children were playing. The little folks saw me coming, and instantly there was an onrush. Affection-starved little girls flung themselves at me and hung on. One of them—a cherub of five and a half years—took from me the muffler I was making, dropped down on the grass, and calmly went on with the knitting. This aroused quite a discussion, and I found that almost all those babies could knit. Most of them, when at home, were knitting for our soldiers.

Never shall I forget those children! Eager, starved for almost everything that children crave, used to loneliness, vifful and pathetic and loving, they swarmed about me, singing their school songs for me, asking questions, begging to be allowed to come and see me when we were all back in the city.

Then came the summons to supper. Forming into line, the children marched away to a supper of the simplest, but best and most wholesome food most of them had known in many a day.

IT was almost bedtime before I saw them again. They were rolling and playing on the lawn, ecstatic with joy over a hurdy-gurdy provided for their entertainment. Its cheery strains greeted me as I strolled down across the lawn towards them. The doctor was seated on a bench, watching them smilingly, and I joined her. It was the loveliest hour of the day. The air was cool and fresh. The trees were stirring faintly. There was a thrum of insects. Those little "children of His care," were laughing and playing and darting about, their hair flying, the color coming into their pale cheeks, and the fresh air pumping all the slum-foulness out of their little lungs. I longed to be a Croesus that I might gather up all the children from all the slums of the world and bring them there.

Mont-Lawn's Happy Fourth

NEVER in its history has our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn celebrated the Fourth with more vigor and enjoyment than this year. From early morning until nightfall, the 330 children had the merriest time of their lives. There was a goodly number of visitors who had come from many points to spend the holiday with the children. Among them were Mrs. Louis Klopsch, whose husband, the late Dr.

Klopsch, was the founder and organizer of the enterprise, which has enlisted friends all over this nation and given delightful and health-giving summer outings to over 50,000 children up to the present time. Mrs. Merritt, Mrs. Charles G. Miller and Miss Brenda Stock, a young lady from New Zealand with a delightful contralto voice, were also among the visitors.

The real celebration of the day began with the exercises in the Children's Temple. At the signal, all the little folks were called in from the athletic field, and marched with military precision along Sunshine Alley to the beautiful Temple. It was a stirring sight to witness the enthusiasm of the children as they sang their patriotic songs and waved their flags. They listened with intense attention to several short addresses. Maynard Owen Williams told them of the brightly-clothed children of Japan, the less gaily dressed little folk of China, the happy little ones of perplexed Russia and the hungry, half-clothed and sad-faced children of Armenia. Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart told eloquently of the flag, the Republic for which it stands and the meaning back of the celebration of the Fourth. When in a stirring apostrophe to the Stars and Stripes, he said, I olding the flag before him, that "it never has, and please God never shall know defeat!" the children shouted their applause.

AFTER the children had sung their "Star Spangled Banner" and "Mont-Lawn Bells," Mrs. Charles Grant Miller, dressed as Betsy Ross and assisted by Miss Stock, representing "Miss Columbia," told the children the stories of the origin of the best known of our national songs. She had intended to let them guess who she herself represented, but she had spoken only a few sentences when a curly-headed boy sang out, "Betsy Ross!" He received at once the reward which was to have been held until the story of the first Stars and Stripes should have given the key to the costume. Beginning with the story of the making of the first flag by the skilful fingers of Mistress Betsy, Mrs. Miller told of the origins of "Yankee Doodle," "America," "Red, White and Blue," "We're Coming Father Abraham," "Marching Through Georgia," "Dixie," and "The Star Spangled Banner." Frequently the name of the song was spoken by some of the listeners before she was quite ready to ask for it. Miss Stock very effectively sang a stanza or two of each song. "Over There" could not be omitted.

After this, Miss Columbia was joined by Uncle Sam and by children dressed to represent the Red Cross, the Army and the Navy, and these last, around the flagpole on the great lawn in front of the Children's Temple, pledged to Uncle Sam their hands to bear his burdens, their feet to run his errands, and their hearts to uphold his faith and purposes.

The late sunlight of a perfect summer day slanting through the towering trees saw the whole company in a semicircle about the big flagpole on the lawn before the Chapel, where once more, led by Uncle Sam and Miss Columbia, they pledged allegiance to the flag of freedom.

Entrance to the Union Stock Yards in Chicago

IN Chicago, that mighty center of food, there is a legend that goes with every pound of war meat: "United States Inspected and Passed." It is the best guarantee any one could ask that our soldiers are safeguarded against everything unfit or unwholesome in beef, pork or mutton.

Nobody can spend days in the packing houses, as I have done, and go away from Chicago without feeling that all the Allied armies, so far as they come under our vast meat supply, are getting the best that this marvelous land can give them.

For the Christian Herald I have just made a trip to the inland metropolis to get first-hand facts about meats, and although I had already studied the subject superficially, I left the Yards on this occasion with the conviction that our boys are not victims of a meat conspiracy. To believe otherwise would discredit the whole elaborate inspection system of our own government—perfected through years of practical application.

In Chicago, moreover, is found amazing evidence of our country's prodigious food capacity. Here at the Stock Yards plants, one is staggered by the quantities of meat, and the workers are counted by the tens of thousands. Nor can we measure the industry by the number of people; organization and machinery count heavily, and the puny efforts of man are multiplied a hundredfold.

THE inspection of food animals begins on their native pastures, but I must pass over the field work of the government and start with the endless procession that winds its gloomy way to the executioners. Here begins the real challenge to bad meat, as made by the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture.

Altogether there are nearly four hundred government inspectors at the Yards, both veterinarians and trained laymen. Standing on a bridge over a maze of pens, I looked down on thousands of cattle, hogs and sheep—but not all of them were destined for the patriotic purpose of food. At the six principal livestock markets in the United States in 1917, the carcasses of cattle condemned for tuberculosis alone would require for transportation fifty freight trains of forty cars each. The inspectors at these plants found 131,316 cattle and 2,008,921 hogs to be tubercular—though not all of these were a complete loss. Ten per cent. of the 34,000,000 hogs slaughtered in the United States last year were found more or less infected with tuberculosis. They came from over 6,000,000 farms. The annual loss of animals through

Safeguarding Our Army's Food Supply

The Rigid Methods Employed at the Great Packing Houses—Government Inspection a Monumental Instructive Work, Worthy of the Nation

By EDWARD MOTT WOOLLEY

FEDERAL efficiency in all that relates to the Nation's Food Supply, and especially to the provisioning of our Army and Navy in the great War, has never been better exemplified than in the extraordinary care that is shown in the government inspection of meats and meat products at all of the great packing establishments. Mr. Woolley, who has studied the subject from an expert's viewpoint, here tells of his minute and careful investigation. His story is one which will be gratifying to all readers, assuring them as it does that Uncle Sam takes the very best care of his Boys on sea and land.

disease and exposure is more than $300,000,000. This gives you a perspective.

But practically all these hordes of animals I saw at the Chicago Yards were foredoomed to death, whether passed for food or not. I saw only one animal pardoned and sent back to green pastures: an agreeable-mannered brindle cow with expectations. As the animals passed in single file through the gate of doom, the veterinary inspectors picked out now and then a "suspect," attached a metal tag to its ear, and sent it to a place of detention.

But in some cases the final verdict came swiftly: "United States Condemned." I saw a splendid white-nosed steer thus ushered on his way to an ignominious death, for in a great tank his massive carcass was destined to be made into fertilizer.

THIS ante-mortem inspection may detect in cattle such diseases as tuberculosis, lumpy jaw, diphtheria, pneumonia, scabies, anthrax, black-leg, septicemia, peritonitis, anemia, and other afflictions. In hogs, it may reveal swine plague or cholera, tuberculosis and so on. Standing on another bridge, I saw them taking the temperature of an extraordinarily big porker. His fever ran above 106, and, after being marked for identification, he was turned into a pen for further observation. Probably he went into the tank along with his compatriot in death and disgrace, the big steer.

But whether the victims be cattle, hogs or sheep, a verdict of dangerous disease is followed quickly and automatically by execution—done separately and under rigid regulations. The killing beds are disinfected with bichlorid of mercury, and all knives and other instruments are specially treated. This, for instance, is the procedure where lockjaw—now very rare—is found. Every part of the animal so affected, even to the hides and hoofs, must be incinerated. In brief, the ante-mortem catches everything it is possible to detect in the live animal. The great bulk of animals pass, and are slaughtered in the regulation way.

Now comes the post-mortem, which takes endless ramifications. I stood in the cattle-killing room and watched operations. At one end the massive animals came tumbling out of the stunning-pens, senseless, and within a few minutes the carcasses were hanging by the hoofs. As the huge knives loosened the viscera, all the internal organs of each animal fell into a metal water-tight truck that was tagged to correspond with the identifying mark on the carcass. The heads, too, went along.

These trucks then went to another part of the room where the government veterinarians worked; and they searched out the various organs and glands most likely to be infected, and with their keen knives laid them open. I saw one of them pause and inspect a gland closely.

"Tubercular," he said to me, holding it up.

Then he told me that sometimes he found eggs of the tapeworm—transmissible to man—in the heart, though such parasites are more commonly found, in cystic form, in the glands of the cheek.

THE finding of the tubercular glands meant that the whole truck-load of viscera, and the carcass from which it came, must go to the retaining-room, popularly known as the "jail." Here all the "retained" carcasses and parts are re-examined, and are either condemned altogether or passed in part for food.

Where certain infections are merely localized, and other parts of the animal thoroughly wholesome, the government authorizes the use of the latter. The principle is the same when we cut out a spot on an apple. Some extremists would have all animals wholly condemned if they show any untoward conditions whatever, but the government and its technical experts do not so believe. Health would not be conserved, and a vast economic waste of food would result.

Then there is another regulation of the government which provides that under certain conditions carcasses and parts are "passed for sterilization," to be rendered into lard or tallow; or used for certain food purposes only when sterilized and properly marked. This process is analogous to the pasteurization of milk, but more definite and certain. But in a big class of diseases and infections the entire carcass is condemned—as in blackleg, septicemia, Texas fever

A packing plant is a maze of multiplied buildings, each with its part in the work of producing food and by-products. The group of buildings above shows one great packing plant, representative of all the rest malignant epizootic catarrh, acute inflammation of the lungs, and many others.

THERE are four separate post-mortem inspections of each animal before it is passed for cutting up. If you are there in the killing-room for the first time perhaps you feel a bit panicky. A sanguinary place it is, truly; but except for it, a large part of the Allied armies would go meatless. You get a vista of killed cattle stretched on their backs under the knives of the butchers. If you walk about, you run the risk of colliding with the dangling carcasses as they travel their path through the departments. In the swine section they call it the "hog railroad."

Everywhere men in bloody caps and aprons are sawing and cutting. The terminology is inelegant: stickers, leggers, caul pullers, backers, rump sawyers, splitters, neckmen, trimmers, gutters and bloodsuckers. The latter catch the blood, in buckets, that is to be used for edible purposes. The identity of each pailful is kept until the animal itself is passed or rejected. It is interesting to study the manner in which the smallest organ is held and identified until the fitness of the whole animal for human food is established.

Cleanliness, too, is part of the government inspection. As I walked through these gory scenes, I heard a wild shout behind me and a great splash. Turning quickly, I jumped in time to avoid a torrent of water that swept over the floor, leaving it clean. The carcasses themselves are scrubbed with brushes and flowing water. Before they get to the chill-room all parts of both carcasses and internal organs are examined several times and stamped in fourteen or more places, "United States Inspected and Passed." From the chill-room the great halves of beef go to the sharp freezers. In one of them, where I spent half an hour, the temperature was eight below zero. A government inspector, in ulster and cap, with his ears covered, was examining the double cloth wrappers enclosing the beef.

THIS freezing department was immense, with many huge rooms, bitterly cold. And still more bewildering was the contents—seemingly miles of fresh beef carcasses for the armies. The spectacle was awesome evidence of the bigness of our country. On our farms are 64,000,000 cattle, 67,000,000 hogs and 47,000,000 sheep.

Then we went along to the departments where the meats are cut up, cured, or otherwise preserved. Every process is regulated by the United States. For instance, practically the only preservatives now allowed are wood smoke, sugar, apple vinegar, salt and saltpeter. An inspector with a dipper was taking some curing fluid from a vat for the Bureau laboratory. Other inspectors were getting samples from the canning-rooms.

To keep check on the inspectors themselves there are traveling inspectors, who show up at unexpected times and take samples. Perhaps one of these auto-crats will cut a piece from a bologna sausage and carry it off. There is also a night inspection patrol by government men as a safeguard against tampering.

It must be remembered, however, that all packing houses do not come under government inspection. The law applies only to plants doing interstate business. In 1917 there were slaughtered in the United States over 18,000,000 cattle, of which only fifty-six per cent. came under government supervision. In the same period were slaughtered 12,000,000 sheep and 57,000,000 hogs. Seventy-seven per cent. of the former and fifty-nine per cent. of the latter were "United States Inspected and Passed."

Some states have good meat laws, but in the main the state regulations are very bad. In the big packing centers the people get the benefit of this wonderfully complete technical inspection; elsewhere they often eat the products of plants that run under lax methods. The inspection system forbids all masquerading of products. Pork sausage must be pork sausage.

THE regulations are indeed minute and far-reaching. Following my guide I stepped into the "rainbow room," as they sometimes call it. Here are stored the coloring matter and preservatives; and it is fitted with a special lock the key of which remains in the government man's pocket. The dyes used on sausage casings are specified by the Bureau as harmless.

Fats are very valuable these days. Every possible bit is saved and undergoes drastic inspection. Oleo oil, made from cattle fats, is the basis of oleomargarine. These oleo departments are immense, and vast quantities are sent to the armies. Here you see long vistas of men and women in white caps, gowns and cotton gloves. Their hands are not allowed to touch the product. As far as you can see are broad vats full of golden product, handled only with wooden shovels and paddles. Among the vats are extra government inspectors—soldiers in army uniform. Their duty is to watch for anything objectionable. Most of the Bureau men in the products inspection are lay inspectors, specially trained. Here, as elsewhere, they supervise every procedure. No ingredients may be added without their approval; nothing brought into the department or taken out; no packing done or labels attached; nothing shipped.

IN the canning departments, too, you find amazing evidences of the immensity of the war-food demand. Acres of floor space are crowded to their utmost with workers and machinery. Women stand shoulder to shoulder as far as the eye can reach, capped, gowned and manieured. Cleanliness is the gospel of the Bureau of Animal Industry and of the packers. I talked with several of the girls.

"If things were done like this in the home kitchens," one of them said, "we would think our folks were half crazy."

All about are metal chutes through which meat products go from place to place, and I observed that they were fitted with small sliding panels so that the inspectors could see if the interiors were clean. The chutes themselves are taken down every night, cleansed and polished.

The war has brought the packers gigantic problems in production, for they are called on to feed the market at home as well as millions of men abroad. One of the Chicago plants alone in a single week produced and shipped twenty-five million pounds of products for the European war zone.

Down in the basement of one of the biggest packing plants, I followed my guide through narrow passages among the great tanks where condemned carcasses and parts were being reduced to grease and fertilizer. In these horrid caldrons the bodies of many unfortunate animals find their way back to nature; and here are destroyed countless billions of disease germs that might, except for inspection, go forth in human food.

Down there amid the tanks one feels indeed the all-powerful arm of the government—powerful enough to enforce such mighty mandates.

Before any of the condemned parts are put into these tanks, the lower valves are closed and sealed by the United States inspectors. Then, after being filled, a prescribed quantity of denaturing material, known as power distillate, is added. This is a product of petroleum, and nothing so treated can ever be fit for food. The taste itself would be sufficient to condemn it. The upper openings are next closed and sealed with a metal strap which cannot be broken without discovery. Into the tanks steam is turned at a pressure of forty pounds or more; and thus perish the motley and baleful aggregations of disease microbes. Finally, when the contents have been effectually reduced, a Bureau man removes the seals and the tanks are drained, samples being taken for analysis. At small government-inspected establishments that have no tanking facilities, crude carbolic acid is sometimes used for denaturing.

After witnessing such procedures, one must feel complete incredulity for the stories sometimes repeated carelessly to the effect that condemned meats are smuggled out and sold. Moreover, it is inconceivable, to any one who knows the modern practices of business, to believe that any reputable concern would be a party to such methods. Laying aside all moral considerations, the most ordinary business policy would not permit it.

Then there is such a thing as sentiment even in business. One of the great Chicago packing companies now has a Service Flag containing 4,200 names,

"There Can Be but One Issue"

PRESIDENT WILSON'S Fourth of July oration at the Tomb of Washington was addressed to the whole world and is world-filling in its scope.

Representatives of thirty-two nations and nationalities heard him speak. The head of the American nation laid down "the ends for which the associated peoples of the world are fighting and which must be conceded them before there can be peace."

The seed of liberty planted in the young colonies of a virgin continent are now coming to fruition throughout the earth. "There must now be settled once for all," said the President, "what was settled for America in the great age upon whose inspiration we draw."

This speech of the President, more clearly even than any of his previous utterances, illuminates the real issue. All the nations have come to a realization that the decision in the armed contest depends upon the power of America. Our President has now made it clear that the principles which are to triumph are American principles—that America is to dominate not only the battle-fields but the peace councils.

"There can be but one issue," the President said. "The settlement must be final. There can be no compromise. No half-way decision would be tolerable. No half-way decision is conceivable."

The President's speech is given in full on another page. Every true American should read every word of it. It is a fount of inspiration.

Going Faster and Faster to France

MORE than a million American soldiers are now in France. Announcement by President Wilson on the eve of July 4 that this milestone has been passed and that the tremendous steady stream of fighting men flowing to the battle-fields of Europe is reaching its flood spells the sure defeat of Prussian militarism and inspires the freedom-loving peoples of the world.

How soon the second million mark will be reached will depend only upon the quantity of shipping available for the transportation of troops. The present accelerated programme will not be continued indefinitely, but it is altogether probable that the 1,800,000 men, who as Secretary Baker said in his testimony before the Senate committee were to be ready in the latter part of 1918, will have reached France by the end of this year.

The exact figures of troop shipments month by month since May, 1917, are set forth in a letter to the President from the Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker. The total number of troops that have left the United States up to July 1 is 1,019,115. From May, 1917, during which 1,718 were sent over, the number has grown to 276,372 in June, 1918.

The Secretary of War called attention especially to the significance of the figures of troop shipments for the last month. It was in June that the German submarine raiders appeared off the Atlantic coast, simultaneously with the threat made in the German press that American troopships would be stopped as they left American harbors. In that month the total number of troops embarked for France was 276,372. "This," said Secretary Baker, "is America's response to the German submarine threat."

In mobilizing the man power of the country and in the transportation of troops to Europe in defiance of Germany's threat of destruction by submarines, the War Department is approximately six months ahead of its programme laid down when the United States entered the war.

Trial by Fire

IN a recent address to workers in Wales, Premier Lloyd George employed a very striking and appropriate figure of speech in reference to world conditions. It is a molten world, he said, in which all the old forms and distinctions and values have lost their individuality and have become fused and intermingled like metal in the glowing furnace. And it must not be allowed to harden into the old shape, but molded into one that is newer and better.

Someone has discovered that the same thought has been expressed by a French poet months earlier, who held it to be the task of the nations to assist the divine Forge-Master in molding, welding, and reshaping the world aright.

This "trial by fire," which is compelling a general reassessment by all the nations of those things that, in the passing order of affairs, have been unduly valued, has an especial spiritual significance. Paul puts the figure in a form that is both clear and comprehensive, in his message to the Corinthians: "But if any man buildeth on the foundation gold, silver, costly stones, wood, hay stubble; each man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare of it, because it is revealed in fire; and the fire itself shall prove each man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work shall abide, he shall receive a reward." Thus, while nothing save the perishable and worthless is lost in the testing furnace, that which is saved becomes by contrast more precious than ever.

For four years the flames of war have been clearing the world atmosphere of the shams and delusions of false religion, which like clouds and vapors that hide the sunlight, have obscured from the spiritual vision of men the true knowledge of God and the reality of Christ, the Redeemer. They have burned down many of the barrier walls which prevented the unity and cooperation of His followers. They have given to all men a clearer view of the meaning and purpose of human life, and to many a stronger hope of the life which is to come. They have inspired a deeper desire for human brotherhood and a larger appreciation of the standards of democracy. Many other gifts are coming out of the fire, refined, lustrous, shining. No good thing has suffered. Temperance, thrift, moderation, helpfulness, are among those that have stood the test, and come out finer and better.

And the test is still going on; but we can take comfort and courage from the knowledge that the same divine Protector who tempered the flame of the furnace which the mighty king had seven times heated for the three Hebrews, is directing the issues of the war, in righteousness, justice, and mercy. God is still able and willing to take care of His own.

The World's Heart Speaks

IT WAS certainly some celebration. Nothing ever like it. All the celebrations that ever went before paled into littleness beside this tremendous outburst from the world's great heart. And the very heavens themselves smiled approval, and gave their brightest sunshine to gild and gladden the glorious anniversary. Forty-two nationalities under the starry banner, parading in a thousand American cities and towns, and simultaneous demonstrations in Great Britain, France, Italy, Canada and lands afar, showed us how the American idea has grown until, like a great arch of promise, it is spanning the globe.

"There go the ships!" wrote the Psalmist. What would he have written had he seen nearly a hundred mammoth vessels glide into the sea simultaneously on a single day—presage of the fact that there can no longer be a question of any tyrannous power controlling the seas? But it is not only on the sea, where American fleets will predominate, nor on the land where American armies are even now swinging the battle-tides toward the final triumph, nor in the air, where liberty's winged squadrons will soon darken the skies, that the greatest power of this Republic will be demonstrated. The real battle-field is in the hearts and minds of men and women in all the nations, who are listening to the voice that calls them to emancipate themselves from tyranny.

This is the great lesson taught by the world-wide pageant. We are educating the nations to the fact that we are living in a most momentous period, and that now is the time to achieve whatever is worth having, looking to the future happiness and welfare of mankind.

The Value of Cheer

A WESTERN court has awarded a goodly sum to a nurse who enlivened a rich man's declining years with good cheer. The court said that it was impossible to separate physical benefit from good cheer, and that while good cheer itself might not have a definite price, the physical benefit resulting from it certainly has.

The end of a life devoted to mere money-making is not usually a cheerful time, and the cheerful man who can keep such one cheered and happy earns his pay. One must be something of a wizard to build happiness on such a foundation.

Many a millionaire, when ill health or failing strength compels him to drop the pursuit that has absorbed all his life, thought and interest, might be willing to give a large sum to be able to feel cheerful. To those who think that getting rich is the main aim in life and the highest achievement it must seem strange that a poor man should have cheerfulness to spare to a rich one. But such is the way of the world. The most precious things cannot be measured in money. Nor can money buy them. A dying old man cannot buy a laugh outright; but if he can get the laugh, it has its cash value just the same.

"Looking Backward and Walking Backward"

CHARLES E. HUGHES, former Governor of New York, is a very high authority on postal affairs. He was head of the Hughes Postal Commission which made the latest official investigation of the Post Office Department. He is enabled to speak on postal matters with technical authority and a professional reputation of national recognition. He is one of the ablest minds in the national councils. Mr. Hughes condemns the Postal Zone measure as unfair to publishers and public, sectionalizing, reactionary—"decidedly a looking-backward and walking-backward measure"—and he hopes that Congress will repeal it.

The following letter from Mr. Hughes, read recently before the Ways and Means Committee of Congress, speaks for itself and speaks unanswerably:

"1262 New Hampshire Ave.,
Washington, D. C., June 17, 1918.

"Mr. Allen H. Richardson, Publishers Advisory Board, 200 Fifth Ave., New York.

"DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter, I beg to say:

"I prefer not to accept a retainer to appear before legislative committees upon matters of general policy, as in such matters, if I have anything to say, I desire to speak only as a citizen.

"I have no hesitation in saying that I regard the zone system of postal rates for newspapers and periodicals, coming under the definition of second-class mail matter, as ill advised. The Commission on Second-Class Mail Matter (appointed in 1911), of which I was a member, considered this question and reported unanimously against the zone system. We said in that report:

"The policy of zone rates was pursued in the earlier history of our post office and has been given up in favor of a uniform rate in view of the larger interest of the Nation as a whole. It would seem to the Commission to be entirely impracticable to attempt to establish a system of zone rates for second-class matter. * * *

"Progress in the post office, with respect both to economy in administration and to public convenience, leads away from a variety of differential charges to uniform rates and broad classifications."

"In my judgment the zone system for second-class mail matter is unjust to the publisher and unjust to the public. It not only imposes upon the publisher the additional rates upon a sectional basis, but it makes necessary the added expense for the necessary zone classifications at a time when every economy in production and distribution is most important. It introduces a complicated postal system to the inconvenience of the publisher and public when there should be a constant effort toward greater simplicity. There is no more reason for a zone system of rates for newspapers and magazines than for letters.

"Newspapers and magazines are admitted to the second-class postal rates on the well established policy of encouraging the dissemination of intelligence, but a zone system is a barrier to this dissemination. If it is important that newspapers and magazines should be circulated, it is equally important that there should not be sectional divisions to impede their general circulation through the entire country.

"We are proud at this moment of our united purpose, but if we are to continue as a people to cherish united purposes and to maintain our essential unity as a nation, we must foster the influences that promote unity. The greatest of these influences, perhaps, is the spread of intelligence diffused by newspapers and periodical literature. Abuses in connection with second-class mail matter will not be cured by a zone system of rates. That will hurt the good no less than the bad, and perhaps some of the best sort of periodical literature will be hit the hardest.

"We do not wish to promote sectionalism, and 'one country' means that in our correspondence and in the diffusion of necessary intelligence we should have a uniform postal rate for the entire country; the widest and freest interchange is the soundest public policy.

"I hope that Congress will repeal the provision for the zone system which is decidedly a looking-backward and walking-backward measure.

"CHARLES E. HUGHES."

Carried Away Girl Baby

A LITTLE lad of four and his twin brother were the only children in a home. He wanted to have a sister. He had seen little girl babies, and he thought it strange and wrong that they couldn't have one in their own house. A few doors off lived a neighbor who had a little girl-baby of six or eight months old, who was being wheeled about in a baby carriage by her big sister. The little fellow saw the baby carriage at a time when it was unattended, so he wheeled it down to his house, managed to pick up the little baby and take her indoors, and put the baby carriage back, all without being detected. Then there was a circus. When it was discovered that the baby was missing, the whole neighborhood got excited. The mother was frantic; the daughter who was in charge was inconsolable; and the neighbors stood around bewailing the loss. Meanwhile, the little fellow was having a fine time with his baby chum. She was crowing with delight at her new acquaintance. His mother, who had learned of the trouble outside, was thunderstruck when she came into the room and found her little man playing with the missing baby. She shook him. He explained that he wanted a baby sister to play with. The next minute she was out of the door, and down the street where the baby belonged, and half of the neighborhood after her. The mother of the baby was too glad to have her little one back to feel any resentment at Johnnie's abduction, and general good feeling prevailed, although Johnnie doubtless got a good talking to from his mother. The little fellow did not realize the wrong he was doing. When he kidnapped the baby, he was giving expression to the deep desire for a sister, which is one of the sweetest loves of life, and one of the greatest blessings of the family. He who has had a sister knows what a priceless treasure she is. Jesus of Nazareth knew the joy of having sisters in the family. There is this reference to them: "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James, and Joses and of Juda, and Simon? and are not his sisters here with us?" (Mark 6 : 3.)

Senate's War Prohibition

THE prohibition amendment offered by Senator Norris of Nebraska, as a substitute for that by Senator Jones of Washington, was adopted on June 27 by the Senate Agricultural Committee, 8 to 3. It prohibits the sale of distilled spirits and the manufacture of wine or the removal of liquors now held in bond after June 30, 1919. The manufacture of beer would be stopped three months after passage of the bill. The plan is to call it up after the army bill is disposed of and fight it out in the open Senate. The friends of the measure believe that the measure will pass. The nation is now saying and will doubtless continue to say in this new bone-dry war bill to our brave men defending the flag and people behind them: "Quit you like men; be strong!" (1 Cor. 16 : 13.)

Waiting at the Window

WHEN Samuel Jack, a traveling hardware merchant of New York, finished his day's work and returned to his home recently, he saw sitting at the window awaiting his return, as had been her custom for years, his wife Margaret, and then flew away from us, because the heavenly skies were so fair, the flowers so beautiful, and the melody so entertaining, are clapping their hands to us. To be pitied are those whose spiritual vision has been so dulled by this material age that they cannot see that those we call dead are alive and happy, and waiting at the window to welcome them home forever. Christ's description of heaven is that of a home for the family: "In my Father's house are many mansions." (John 14 : 2.)

Horrible Circus Wreck

AN empty soldiers' equipment train ran into the rear end of the Wallace Hagenbeck Circus train near Gary, Indiana, recently, and plowed all the way through it, killing 52 and injuring 179, all of them circus people. The circus train pulled part way into a switch and stalled there. The equipment train dashing at a high speed plowed through the circus sleepers, reducing them to a pile of tangled steel and timbers. Fire engendered by the gas lighting system of the circus train started almost immediately and many not killed by the crash were burned to death. One dear woman pinned in the flames called out to her rescuers: "Look out; don't come too near me. You will burn yourself to death," and was soon licked up by the flames herself. Twenty-nine bodies were burned beyond recognition. Joe Coyle, one of the clowns, wept bitterly as he lay on a stretcher and told how his wife and two babies had joined him only recently, and how all three had been crushed to death at his very side. "The kiddies had been so glad to see their daddy," he said, "I wish I could have died with them." The blame is laid on the engineer and he waved his hand, but she did not respond. Entering the house he found the door to the apartment locked. When his wife failed to answer to his repeated knockings, he, thinking her asleep, obtained a pass-key from the janitor and entered. His wife was still sitting in the window, but she was dead from heart disease. Those that watched at the window for us to come home, and have fallen asleep, are not dead; they are only translated. This earthly life would be very lonesome and disappointing if the eye of faith did not reveal the faces of our loved ones looking through the palace windows, and waiting for us to come to them; the faces of father, mother, brother, sister, companion. The sweet angel children who climbed on our knees, and nestled on our bosom, of the soldiers' train who is claimed by some blindness, or stupidity, ran past three distinct signals. Such a horrible massacre as the result of gross incompetency is a crime which should be punished as murder, and the heads of the corporations as well as the overworked employee whose sight and senses are dulled by want of sleep should be defendants in the murder suit. If it were not for the loss of these precious lives, the wiping out of a circus train, in the view of many people, might not be regarded as much of a calamity. Even circuses with their menageries have their uses, however, educational and otherwise, although it is doubtless true that the average circus is more or less of a demoralizing influence. However this may be, one cannot avoid the thought that it is always a spiritual tragedy for people to be suddenly plunged out of life into eternity without a moment's warning. How essential then it is for all of us to so regulate our business, our pleasures, and indeed all of our lives, that we may be prepared. The Bible utters this warning on the subject: "Be ye also ready." (Matt. 24 : 44.)

Washington Gladden Dies

REV. WASHINGTON GLADDEN, a Congregational minister of nation-wide reputation, died at his home in Columbus, Ohio, July 2, at the age of 82. He was born February 11, 1836, at Pottsgrove, Pa. His father was a country school teacher. When he was very young his father died, and his mother brought the youth to New York state, where he worked on a farm, served as a printer's devil, attended school, and finally entered Williams College. After that he taught, preached, and then, with no attendance at a theological school, was ordained in the Congregational Church and became pastor of a little country church. Later he held pastorates in churches in Brooklyn and

New York City. He was for four years on the staff of the Independent. The First Congregational Church of Columbus, to which he was called, is a famous church of that city. Dr. Gladden was pastor of this church for thirty-two years, and in late years had been pastor emeritus. He was a member of the city Council of Columbus, made a hard fight for the reduction of Street Car fare. He took a prominent part in the settlement of the great Anthracite Coal Strike of 1902. Dr. Gladden was a prolific author and a man of tremendous mental force and of deep moral conviction, and of all daring courage. At the close of a long life of militancy against the moral evil it can be said of this fearless apostle, this true prophet of God, what the apostle Paul said of himself: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day." (1 Tim. 4 : 7, 8.)

America Makes Own Dyes

WHEN the war broke out, our country wondered what it would do for dyes so necessary to many industries, as Germany had the secret of making them, and we had to import them from there. But necessity being the mother of invention, the Yankee mind set itself to work to discover the secret of making dyes of the same grade as those of Germany, or maybe better, and last year we made more dye-stuffs than we had imported from Germany. The United States Tariff Commission's 1917 census of coal-tar products shows that the eighty-one establishments manufacturing coal-tar dyes in that year produced quantities in excess of those imported from Germany before the war. Imports for the fiscal year 1914 were 45,840,966 pounds, and the production in the United States in 1917 amounted to 45,977,346 pounds, worth about $60,000,000. Exports during 1917 amounted to $11,700,287, showing the production to be in excess of American needs. Under the general head of coal-tar products are included not only the dyes and the crude and intermediate materials for their manufacture, but also all the medicinal and photographic chemicals, explosives, synthetic resins, synthetic perfume materials and flavors which are in any way derived from coal-tar products. We have no evidence that the ancients knew anything about coal-tar products, but they made the most beautiful and lasting dyes out of vegetable, mineral, and even animal materials which they discovered. The dyes of Tyre gave her a brilliant page in the world's history. The Jews used dye-stuffs, and used them in the making of their choicest articles. Much color was used in building the tabernacle. Among the contributions he commanded Moses to ask of the children of Israel were "blue and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair, and rams' skins dyed red." (Ex. 25 : 4, 5.)

The Spiritual Uses of Memory

A SERMON BY PASTOR JUNIUS B. REMENSNYDER*

TEXT—Luke 16: 25. "But Abraham said, Son, remember."

ONE of the most remarkable of our mental faculties is that of memory. This is the power by which we recall and perpetuate the past. We behold a lovely flower, and as we pass from it its image still lingers before our eye; or we look upon a lofty mountain, and after we have left, we carry with us its cloud-wrapt summit.

So we read or hear a great truth, which stirs our minds and thrills our souls. We close the book, but the thought abides with us. Memory stores it in a mental niche, where time and again we can take it down, think over it and feel again its thrill and uplift. Thus with our deeds. They do not vanish as the passing cloud, but they are graven on the tablet of memory. They are unforgettable. We cannot banish them if we would. Every one carries with him a book recording his personal history. Our secret thoughts, our words and deeds, are not to be blotted out. Our past yet lives in the present.

This gift of the Creator was meant for a beneficent purpose. It was designed to augment our happiness. How many of our rarest pleasures do we owe to it! Through it, life's "sweetness is long drawn out." Who would forget the sunny hours of innocent childhood and eager youth? How pleasant to recall and taste again happy scenes and joyous hours! In this review how manifest are God's many mercies, how clear become his providential leadings—obscure and perhaps dark at the time! How gracious appear his merciful deliverances, his guiding hand in shielding us from ourselves, our errors and blunders, and in rescuing us from calamities and dangers! Verily, one of the most blessed uses of memory is this study of divine goodness, the review of this story of fatherly mercies as shown in every life.

AND as we recall and commemorate our natural birthdays, so there are moral birthdays, vital periods, turning points, crisis hours in every soul-history; times when we fought a great fight, and won a moral victory; when we first realized ourselves; when the greatness of life and the possibilities dormant in our souls were first revealed to us; when life's mystery stood unveiled; when we saw it "steadily and saw it whole." It was our awakening, our new birth, our conversion.

Such a great experience came to Charles Kingsley. He says of it: "This is my birthright. I have been for the last hour on the seashore, not dreaming, but thinking deeply and strongly, and forming resolves which are to affect my destiny through time and eternity. Before the sleepless sea and stars I have devoted myself to God, a vow never—if he gives me the grace I pray for—to be recalled."

Now, all of us, more or less, have such great moments, such crisis-periods, such new births to higher ideals in our experience. And a most important use of memory is to recall and vivify them. Never should we allow sordid aims, sensual desires, and worldly cares to dim and dull them. But we should freshen their vision, hear anew their voice, feel again their noble impulses. In these holy moments, God spoke to us from out the cloud; and ever after, we should take with us the divine call.

* Pastor, St. James Lutheran Church, New York City.

And then there are other minor but delightful agencies of memory. One is the remembrance of good deeds, of kindly acts, of little charities, of flowers we have strewn in some thorny path; of help given some struggling brother or sister; of smiles our good will has brought to some face downcast by a hard lot in life. Of such little deeds of kindness scattered by the way-side, we may well say, "A thing of beauty is a joy forever." And many a gleam of light and glow of heart will they bring us, and that perhaps in an hour when we ourselves need cheer.

AND then there are the memories of friendships, of associations with beautiful spirits and with hearts fond and true. What pleasure purer and sweeter than the recall of these! How much these near intimacies of noble men and lovely women do to soften the ruggedness and brighten the heaviness of our pilgrimage, and strengthen us for life's battles! Some of these are precious memories of departed friends. By means of this faculty we may again "feel the touch of a vanished hand" and hear "the sound of voice that is still." And of such friendships, haloed by the past, we may sing with the sweet notes of Moore:

Long, long be my heart with such memories filled,
Like the vase in which roses have once been distilled;
You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still.

But there is another and a bitter office of memory which also requires to be considered. Many things, alas, in the lives of the best of us, are blurred by our weaknesses, our littlenesses, our faults and our sins. And these we would too gladly forget, banish, put out of mind, if we could. Forgetfulness of God; lack of self-mastery; indulgence of evil thoughts and passions; acts of selfishness, narrowness and intolerance toward others; outbreaks of temper; harsh, unkind and unjust words toward our fellow men and sometimes to those we hold most dear. How about these? Can we cast them into some gulf of oblivion? Can we toss them as feathers into the air, never to trouble us again? We might, were it not for this faculty of memory. But there it stands in the hall of the past, pointing at us the accusing finger. Like murdered Banquo's ghost, it will not down. We cannot bribe it, we cannot hide it out of sight, we cannot hush it with excuses; we cannot drown it by plunging into dissipation; we can find no waters of Lethe deep enough to wash out the reproachful stains. There are no agonies keener than those of a burdened conscience. The sharpest pangs that writhe and torture the soul are those inflicted by the scorpion tongue, the burning lash of a sin-laden memory.

THE Gospel for today directs our attention to the most thrilling function of memory. That is its office in the future world. This the omniscient eye of the Lord Jesus Christ, which could penetrate the veil that hides the coming state, here uncovers for us. He follows a soul that has led a merely worldly life—heeding neither the voice of conscience, nor the calls of religion—into the realm of departed spirits. This soul finds itself exiled from heaven and happiness, in the prison of the lost. And, seeing Abraham bearing the beggar Lazarus—who had formerly lain a suppliant at his palatial gate—into Paradise, he appeals to Abraham for relief. Abraham answers him kindly but decidedly. And the conclusive word in his answer is this of "Remember!" It is the most soul-piercing word that can be spoken to us in the future. In that realm of calm and pure spirit, the forgetfulness that often hides smiting facts from us will have disappeared, and memory will revivify the past with a startling reality. And so the sainted patriarch makes reply, "Son, remember" that God wondrously favored you, but you quite forgot him. "Remember" that the offer of grace was urged and re-urged upon you by the ministers of religion, but you coolly despised it. "Remember" that you deliberately wasted your season of opportunity; that you were fully warned, and made your choice with stoical calculation, and that, therefore, there remains nothing for you but to accept the outcome. Truly thus does the poet Milton express this truth of the self-torture of memory in the future when he makes the lost fiend, Satan, cry:

"Me miserable! which way shall I fly
Infinite wrath and infinite despair?
Which way I fly is hell; myself am hell."

WE learn from this theme that a chief purpose of memory is that we may take a summary of our lives—that we may see them as a whole; that we may make a study of ourselves; that we may put this and that act together and frame a full picture of our character. And if the review be disconcerting, then we can take measures to improve it. Remembering our faults, we can correct them. Seeing our weak points, we can stand on guard against them. Thus, studying our past searchingly and impartially, we can lead new, better and worthier lives.

Again, we should exercise memory. This requires quiet and time. It demands pause. We are too much borne along by the hurry and stress of life. We are too little alone with ourselves. Hence we do not know ourselves as well as others who look at us dispassionately. We, then, should live not altogether in the swirl of business and society, but we should seek the quiet, the pensive hour. We should take time for retrospective thought. We should test our life-totality by the light of God's Word, and by the image of Christ. And we should strive to make it such that, looking back, we can say with Paul: "I have fought the good fight," or with Jesus: "Father, I have finished the work thou gavest me to do."

And let us exercise this office of memory now, at the opportune time—before it is too late. Thus, it will be a benevolent friend, helping us to correct defects and brighten virtues and recompense wrongs, instead of a Nemesis, striking us with un pitying and remediless blow.

Finally, let us take care to have pleasing memories, remembrances that will bring no pang of remorse to our hearts, no accusing sting to our consciences, no blush of shame to our cheeks. Let us, as says a brilliant writer, "Live virtuously, make true friends, read the good old books, lay up a store of kindly recollections, of pleasant talks, of fireside gatherings, and of innocent joys." Let memory's page be writ in shining letters with the story of moral victories, of manly deeds, of gracious words, and of pious devotions. And then it will be as a strain of sweet music to our hearts in coming years. Such pleasing reminiscences write the poetry of old age. And these happy memories of the past will be prophetic of a joyous remembrance in the future life.

PERHAPS the greatest single effort to reach soldiers and sailors with the Gospel of Christ was made in Newport News, Va.

Newport News, normally a city of 2,000, has at present a population of nearly 75,000. The increase is due to the cantonments in the vicinity, no other city in the country having so large a number of camps. Newport News is one of the chief embarkation ports. Large numbers of men from all the cantonments in the country pass through its gates. Not only are there soldiers and sailors, but workmen of every trade from all parts of the country have come to help push the war work. Fathers, mothers, wives and sweethearts come to stay with their boys, husbands and lovers, until they are called to go across. No other place affords such opportunities for reaching men in the service.

The churches united and erected a large tabernacle, with a seating capacity of 4,000. The churches, pastors, newspaper men, business men, chaplains, Y. M. C. A. workers, camp pastors and government officials issued a call to Dr. W. E. Biederwolf to come and lead in a great effort to bring men to Christ. Dr. Biederwolf contributed his services without compensation, and the other expenses of the campaign were provided for by special contributions from the local churches, along with support given by the National Service Commission of the Presbyterian Church North.

At the opening service the large tabernacle was filled, and more than 2,000 people were turned away. Several hundred men in uniform accepted the first invitation.

The special music was furnished by the National Male Quartet, which has traveled with Dr. Biederwolf for a number of years.

THE South Africa General Mission, which is international and inter-denominational, was established twenty-eight years ago, with the Rev. Dr. Andrew Murray as president. The work has steadily grown until it extends from Cape Town on the south to North Rhodesia and Nyasaland on the north. There are over 125 missionaries and native evangelists, besides teachers and volunteer workers who are winning many for Christ from heathen darkness.

The Mohammedans are sweeping down from the north with an earnest determination to win as many of the 70,000,000 heathen as possible for the false prophet. They are aggressively organized and have an assertiveness and confidence not shown for 500 years. Mohammedanism is pushing its way along the various thoroughfares of North and Central Africa and working steadily south day and night. This is an urgent call to every Christian to help now in the evangelization of Africa. It is sad to think of the scores of millions of people living year after year throughout a lifetime and not having one opportunity of hearing of our Saviour.

There are Mohammedans that might have been Christians if they had only known about our Lord. What about the 70,000,000 of Africa's heathen—shall they be won for Christ or Mohammed? The South Africa General Mission needs more missionaries now.

Mistakes of Life

SUNDAY, July 21. I Cor. 3:18. "If any man thinketh he is wise among you in this world, let him become a fool that he may become wise." There is a very troublesome thing in life. We mistake something for something else. The mist is about it, and its outlines are exaggerated, and in form and proportions it assumes the shape of a menace. I was once walking along the Northumberland coast on a very foggy day when there loomed before me the figure of a gigantic lion. When I got nearer it turned out to be a church!

I have often had such surprises in the experiences of the soul. The menace in the mist has proved to be the sanctuary of the Lord. We misinterpreted the lines, and we made a threat out of the house of grace.

A form appears on the deep in the uncertain night, and we are afraid, and we say, "It is a spirit!" "And Jesus answers, It is I; be not afraid!"

"He that believeth shall not make haste." He shall not be urged into feverish haste. There shall be no panic. He shall not shy at the apparent antagonism. He shall be endowed with coolness and with calm. "Said I not unto thee that, if thou wilt believe, thou shalt see the glory of God?" J. H. J.

"What of the Night?"

MONDAY, July 22. Isa. 21:11. "Watchman, what of the night?" Night in Biblical imagery may represent moral blindness. "We are not of the night, but of the day." It may represent sorrow: "God our Maker, who giveth songs in the night." Or, it may represent death: "The night cometh when no man can work." When the prophet wrote these words, it was at a time of national peril and national need. Any time of personal loss, of agonizing doubt or of prolonged suspense, brings night to our souls. But night is not without its beauty. It takes night to make the stars visible. And no night that can come to our souls is without its promise. We should not forget that Jesus, in the darkest of all dark nights, sang. So also Paul and his comrade in prison. What a song John Bunyan sang in Bedford jail! There are flowers that bloom only in the dark. The moonflower which flourishes in California, probably a native of Japan, blossoms with the rising of the moon. At night music sounds more musical and loving words more tender. We do see, in periods of apparent ill, what the light of noonday can not reveal. A Christian man failed in business, surrendered all his property to his creditors and moved into a rented house. A friend found him in a little suburban cottage, contented and happy. He had discovered the wealth of love and loyalty in his wife and children, and a certain inward capacity of his own to rise above the loss of mere things.

But, aside from promises which shine like stars in the darkest sky, and aside from the grace God gives us to pass through darkness unafraid, the night has its end in the dawn of day. The world's night ended in the light of the first Christmas, and a better day is coming to this war-torn world when the Sun of righteousness shall rise, with healing in his wings, when Christ shall be enthroned in every heart, and holiness shall be the law of every common life. C. C. A.

The Holy Law

TUESDAY, July 23. Rom. 7:12. "The law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good." The law is the complex of all those precepts by which the holy and righteous Creator, who made man in his own image, has fixed our duties toward him, toward ourselves, and toward our fellow men. It requires that not only our actions but our whole being be such that God can approve of them. It tells us what we are to do, and not to do, and what we are to be. In a brief and compact form the law is set forth in the Ten Commandments. Inasmuch as this law has come from God and is the expression to man of that holiness which is essentially in God, why is it that we must be assured that this law is good? This is because the law addresses its holy and just demands to man in an altogether different state from that state of moral perfection in which he was created and in which he delighted to regulate all his actions by the law. Man in his fallen state discovers that living after the law is a very irksome duty to him. He finds himself hemmed in on all sides by a "thou shalt!" or "thou shalt not!" He does not like this constant assertion of a higher authority than his own will; he becomes angry at its chidings and threats of punishment. The study of the law is very annoying to him, because he cannot take up a single one of its many lessons without becoming convinced in a very short time that he is a defaulter, that his life is not in harmony with the precepts of the holy law. From this perception it is an easy step to the thought that the law of God is not good. His self-interest will counsel man to conceive this thought and to regard it as true. This thought must be battered down whenever it arises in any heart: man must not be permitted to blame the law of God for his failure to comply with it. It is a holy law even while it witnesses against him in every line. It gives the sinner no comfort until he has complied with its righteous demands or has accepted the fulfillment of the law which the Redeemer has rendered in his stead. When he has learnt to know Christ, he learns also to properly respect and esteem the law. W. H. T. D.

Going Direct to Jesus

WEDNESDAY, July 24. Luke 7:19. "Art thou He that should come, or look we for another?" No wonder that hours of gloom came over the soul of John the Baptist in his prison life, where he had little to do but to think and pray. Activity makes one brave, for in the heat of battle fear is forgotten. When great crowds followed the Baptist, he could exclaim, "Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world. I baptize with water, but he shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire." Thus John lifted the curtain and introduced Christ to men, but in the lonely prison, knowing that great crowds were not attending Christ's ministry and that he was not really attempting to burn the chaff and gather the wheat into his garner, he had moments of great depression. His faith failed him. He felt that he had to be certain, for the sake of himself and his own disciples. He took no second-hand opinion, but sent directly to Jesus. Our Lord did not make a public profession of his deity; he would not trust to language to express so great an event. He virtually said to John's questioner, "Believe me for the very works' sake, and tell John that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and to the poor the Gospel is preached." Jesus then turned to the people and uttered a most beautiful eulogy upon the character and life of John the Baptist. The imprisoned hero must have been fully satisfied when the words of Jesus were reported to him. No one would blame him for desiring absolute certainty about the greatest question and personage in all history. When one is sure he has found the everlasting Saviour, he is sure of everything else needful in this world and the world to come, but without him he is at sea, without compass or rudder. Jesus is our Captain and Guide, the solution of our doubts, the Companion of our journey, the Way, the Truth and the Life man is to travel forever. E. W. C.

The Dimensions of Life

THURSDAY, July 25. Rev. 21:16. "The city lies foursquare, and the length is as large as the breadth. . . . The length and the breadth and the height are equal." One of Phillips Brooks' noblest sermons is from this text, and it is a plea for a more abundant life. The entrance of Christianity in the world marked a new epoch in the development of human personality. It is one of the primary axioms of Christian philosophy that each of us owes it to himself to come to the largest possible development of his personality. The stronghold of individualism, as opposed to institutionalism, is in the religion of Christ. His Gospel is a Gospel of humanity and for humanity. It offers the enlargement of life in three directions—in length and breadth and depth.

A great American orator used to speak of death figuratively as "stalking us on the other side of the hedge." Yes, but there is an opening in the hedge, and beyond that opening are the boundless fields of immortality, beyond the threshold of which death can not pass. So our lives are lengthened by the assurance of unbroken continuance beyond the limits of time and space. He was a wise man who said, "A man's life is worth only so much as the things are worth that he is interested in." A man from China found a village storekeeper here in America who knew the geography of China quite as well as he did who had lived there for many years. This man had a map with little pins stuck in it here and there to mark the location of mission stations in which he was interested by gifts and prayers. He seemed to live a narrow life, but in fact he was a citizen of the world. Nothing that concerned the kingdom of God was alien to his mind, and hence his life was broad. Depth measures the sincerity of our convictions. Have we convictions or are we satisfied with mere vague notions? Depth means height as well. What is the height of our lives? The distance by which our hopes transcend mere perishable ends and aims. By so much as we aspire to fellowship with God our lives acquire height. Three great words then represent the possible augmentation of life. Those words are immortality, sympathy, aspiration. C. C. A.

The Essence of Prayer

FRIDAY, July 26. II Chron. 20:12. "O our God, wilt thou not judge them? for we have no might against this great company that cometh against us; neither know we what to do: but our eyes are upon thee." These words are from the prayer of King Jehoshaphat before the slaughter of his enemies in the wilderness of Tekoa. The armies of the Ammonites, Moabites, and the children of Mount Seir were marching against Judah. While the king prayed, his people stood around him, with their little ones, their wives, and their children. And the king confessed in pitiful terms their utter helplessness. Their eyes were upon the Lord: what anxious questions, what abject pleading may have been expressed in the frightened looks of those eyes. The crisis in the nation's life had come. But the eyes of God were also upon this people, and his messenger promptly assured them: "Ye shall not need to fight in this battle: set yourselves, stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord." The next day occurred that strange battle in which the enemies of Judah destroyed each other, until the whole plain was strewn with dead bodies. The Israelites stood on the neighboring hills, singing, praying, worshipping. Not a sword was drawn on their side, not a warrior sallied forth from their ranks. The Lord was literally fighting their battles without them.

Many lessons might be drawn from this episode in the national life of God's ancient covenant people. Let us lay to heart only one: the essence of prayer is an application of the Weak to the Strong. Prayer is the privilege which the good and gracious God accords feeble man, to draw upon the unlimited resources of the Lord God Omnipotent, the Lord God of everlasting strength. Such prayer makes the feeble strong in all their weakness, and to utter such prayer is the height of wisdom. As the child cries for his father and mother when in distress, and confidently trusts that the difficulties with which he cannot cope will be presently removed by his greater strength, so the believer turns to God in the pressure of his straits, and says to his great Helper: "Lord, my eyes are upon thee." W. H. T. D.

Humility and Greatness

SATURDAY, July 27. John 13:7. "What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter." The disciples had been filled with wonder about who should be great in Christ's kingdom. Jesus answered the query by an act of kindly drudgery. It was no doubt difficult to see the Master's simple lesson in that sacred hour between the Holy Communion of the Last Supper and the going out to Gethsemane and Calvary. Washing the disciples' feet appeared a menial obtrusion, as well as an unfit act for a King to thus serve his subjects. No wonder Peter resented the request when he believed his Lord to be the Christ of God. He only yielded when promised that some time he would understand.

It is well to realize that we are only a thread in the loom of divine weaving. When the completed, perfect pattern is seen, the beautiful flower of soul service for others will be the loveliest figure in all the immortal tapestry. The world of Christianity is only just coming to understand the rich meaning of ministering to the vast needs of humanity that appeal to us in war, in ignorance, in sin and suffering. Let us remember that the hand that held the towel shaped the planets, studded the heavens with stars, and, stretched upon the Cross, redeemed a dying race.

Jesus, knowing that he came from God and was going to God, assumed the position of a slave, to teach men how to live for each other. He who is our resurrection and life will gladly do the least little thing for our comfort, for there is no great or small in the Bosom throbbing with love for his children. E. W. C.

REV. JOHN W. BUTLER, of the Methodist Episcopal Church Mission in Mexico, writes as follows to Rev. Dr. Haven of the American Bible Society, New York: "It is just fifty-two years since Maximilian permitted the opening of the first Bible Agency in this country, and up to date something like 1,000,000 copies of the Bible or portions have been distributed. But what are these among so many? Sixteen million men, women and children await the entrance of the Word. As I go about the country and look upon the masses of the people, especially of the humble class, I am more and more impressed with the thought that thousands, if not literally millions, about us can truthfully say, 'No man careth for my soul.' The Bible will reach them differently, and if given generously will bring, in the near future, out of all our disorder a happy and prosperous Mexico, the best of all neighbors lying to your south."

The Delinquency of Patrolman O'Toole

By HELEN CHAMPION GREEN

PATROLMAN O'TOOLE had already stopped twice to look back at that odd little figure seated on the curbing at the corner of the street. It looked so forlorn and cold—and so little. It wasn't on his beat, of course, and he had plenty to think of in his own direct line of duty; yet still, as the big patrolman paced on, the queer little figure on the curb lingered persistently in his mind.

"What's he doin' out this time o' night, anyway?" questioned the policeman as he vigorously tried the door of a tailor's shop and then paused to peer through the darkened window to see that all was well within. Patrolman O'Toole was happily conscious of his own little lads now warmly tucked up in their cribs, their mother sewing by the lamp in the next room, with always a vague hovering watchfulness for any sound that might betoken trouble or discomfort. That was how children should all be tucked away at this hour of the night. What, then, was that tiny scrap of humanity doing there alone and cold and comfortless?

Suddenly the policeman whirled about, and retracing his steps turned at the corner where he had seen the child, and with a half guilty consciousness that he was leaving his beat quickly walked to where the boy sat. Then he saw that the child was quietly sobbing, and his heart reproached him that he had not come sooner.

"Hey there, you young rascal," observed the officer genially. "Keepin' kind o' late hours, seems to me."

The child saw him then for the first time, and springing nimbly to his feet was about to make off when the man threw out a detaining arm and stopped him.

"Where do you live?" asked the policeman shortly.

The child named a street and number in the immediate vicinity.

"Well, you go home to your mother quick's you can beat it, and don't you let me catch you hangin' round the streets again at this time o' night. See?"

"I—I can't," said the child, and his lip began quivering afresh. "I can't."

"Why not?"

"Father'll ketch me. He said he'd lick me for breakin' his pipe—but, honest," the child sobbed desperately, "I didn't mean to do it."

PATROLMAN O'TOOLE looked down intently for a while at the sickly little creature whose big eyes pleaded for mercy. Then he looked off over the rooftops and whistled softly for a minute. He had to whistle to keep back a torrent of words that were called up by the sight of the frightened child and a vision of the man whose pipe he had broken. When his self-possession was completely restored he looked down again in perplexity. "I'll go home with you and see your pa; perhaps I can fix it up with him so he'll be easy with you."

A flash of renewed courage crossed the little fellow's face. He was cold and tired and sleepy; he wanted to go home and go to sleep—if only he dared. Perhaps the presence of the cop—but then his face fell again, for he well remembered his father's oft-repeated and by no means empty boast: he wasn't afraid of the cops, not he!

But the patrolman had reached down a persuasive hand, and the hot, claw-like little hand of the child had grasped it eagerly.

On the short way home the policeman learned a thing or two from the child that in no wise lessened his sympathy for the small wanderer whom he was returning, nor increased his confidence in the undertaking he had in hand.

Murphy's child! As though that wasn't bad enough without gettin' dren, huddled together in a corner like a nest of puppies, opened their sleepy eyes and raised a low wail of fright.

"It's all right, ma'm," protested their visitor. "No harm intended. The kid here tells me he's had a fallin' out with his pa, and I kiud o' thought—I kiud o' thought—" The officer paused in embarrassment and cleared his throat, but the woman sprang forward and seized the child in her arms. "My! I thought he was gone; I thought his father'd killed 'im. He will some day, he sure will."

appeared so puzzling. But he did know Murphy, and the knowledge forbade any degree of optimism which he otherwise might have entertained. The idea of leaving this little scrap of a child to be the butt of a drunken rage was obviously out of the question. "We'll go, the two of us, and see if we can fix things up," he suggested finally.

WHEN the officer and the child entered the saloon Murphy was seated beside a small table alone. There were other men in the room laughing and talking sociably together, but none of them sought Murphy's company; in fact, from the manner in which they were withdrawn to the other end of the place, it would seem that they avoided it. It was always so, but if Murphy noticed it he paid no heed.

Murphy was a giant of a man. He must have measured three good inches more than the patrolman who was now approaching him, and the patrolman boasted six feet and a fraction over. O'Toole was powerful, his lithe, well-trained muscles strong as steel baulds, but the man before him had the neck and shoulders of a Colossus, and the great arm and fist which now lay across the table held the promise of a strength that was formidable.

He started as he beheld the officer and his own small boy, then rose to his feet with a roar of anger. "Drop that!" he shouted. "That's my kid you've got."

O'Toole laughed. "You're wrong there, friend," he returned easily. "Your kid's got me." And in fact, at the sight of the father, the child was clinging to the hand of the officer in a manner that would have made escape difficult.

Murphy, still standing steadily enough on his feet, proceeded to express his opinion of the police force (with especial stress on the character and actions of O'Toole); of the curtailment of individual liberties, and of the child who stood fearfully before him. His language was not choice, but O'Toole did not appear to notice that. In fact, he seated himself quite comfortably in a chair and drew the boy up on his lap.

"Why, the fact is," said O'Toole, when the occasion permitted, "I sort o' took a likin' to the little chap. He told me he'd had a little disagreement—"

The big man made a sudden plunge at the boy. "Tell-in' tales, is he, I'll teach him—"

"Sit down!" said O'Toole abruptly. And for some reason, unknown even to himself, Murphy sat down.

"Yes, sir, I took quite a likin' to this little chap," proceeded the officer blandly. "Sort o' likely lookin' little feller, smart for his age. Ain't as husky as he might be, but he's got brains in his head, and wits that don't need stirrin'."

THE man across the table looked at the two opposite him with crafty and ill-veiled suspicion. Still, any one who had a good word to say for one of the "Murphy brats" was sufficiently surprising to deserve attention. There was a minute of strange silence when licked in the bargain. The policeman knew Murphy by sight and by reputation; most people in that vicinity knew him that much and cared to know him no better. Together they mounted the stairs of the tenement in which Tom Murphy and his family some way or other managed to sustain existence, and the boy pushed the door open, allowing his friend and protector, however, to enter first.

THE room had been quiet enough when they entered, but at sight of the uniform a slatternly woman, who had been sleeping with her head bowed on the table, gave a shrill scream of terror, and instantly a group of chil-

The statement of the distracted mother was far from reassuring to the child, and he caught at the officer's hand with hysterical vehemence. "Where is he?" he whimpered. "Is he comin'?"

"I guess he's where he always is," said the woman bitterly. "I guess he's down to the corner saloon, and he ain't likely to leave till he's that drunk they'll turn 'im out ter fear he'll make trouble. No fear of his makin' trouble up here, o' course," she added sarcastically.

The child had begun to sob again. "He'll lick me when he comes home," he whimpered.

For a time the policeman stood thinking very hard. If he hadn't known Murphy, the situation would not have the officer had finished speaking. Then the man slowly pushed forward his heavy head and shoulders till he leaned well across the table. "Say," said he, thickly, "what's your business? Out with it, and no more hedgin'."

Patrolman O'Toole raised his head and smiled, and there was always something strangely disarming in O'Toole's smile. It went to the heart some way, and there, even in the most unpromising soil, struck a spark of friendliness. There wasn't much of such in the heart of the man whom he now addressed, yet the man was still human, and the smile had its effect. The great bulky figure sank back in the chair, and something like wonder came into the bleared eyes. "I came in here to see you," said O'Toole pleasantly.

"Took a likin' to me too?" asked the man, and his lips curled back in an unpleasant smile.

"No, oh, no," said the policeman frankly. "I can't say that exactly."

Some subtle change in the man's face almost indicated that he wished the other could say that, though if he had he would have known it was a lie.

"No," continued O'Toole easily. "But I've seen you around these parts considerable, and I've said to myself, 'There goes a man that's never had a fair chance. Luek's been against him, and folks has been against him, and he hasn't had no chance.'"

A SUDDEN quiver of self-pity crossed the mean, sodden features of the man in question, and he brought his huge fist down upon the small table with startling force. "You're right," he said thickly. "You're right there!"

Patrolman O'Toole nodded thoughtfully. "I says to myself," he continued, "'There ain't no more harm in that big man than there is in this here little kid, not if you treat 'im right; that man ain't been treated right.'"

"No, I ain't!" exploded Murphy impulsively. "I ain't never been treated right!"

"And he's had hard luek," proceeded the officer smoothly; "'lots o' hard luek; some of it's his fault, and some of it ain't. But there's never been a soul to help 'im and answer for how he's straight, so's he can get a job. It ain't no wonder, I says to myself, that he gets sort o' ugly now and then; I guess I'd be kind o' ugly myself if I'd had the hard luek that man's had.'"

O'Toole paused and smiled again. Murphy met his eyes for an instant, then quickly shifted his own. "Well, now, it just came into me mind," continued the patrolman serenely, "I'd like to give that fellow a helpin' hand and see if I'm not right. Ugly! Why, in his heart he's gentle as a kitten. So I picks up the kid and in I walks."

The kitten-like individual referred to kept his eyes fixed on the floor, but the fact was that something sinister and threatening had indeed gone out of his ill-featured countenance. Had he known how to give an indication of friendliness he would have done so, but the man did not know how.

"How things does change!" said the officer meditatively, "when a man's got a good job and is workin' steady. It ain't the same world, and folks ain't the same people. Why, I'll just send you down to my friend MaeNally, and before two weeks is out folks'll hardly recognize you. You'll be comin' home Saturday nights after work, and the kids, they'll hear you soon's your feet strike the stairs; they'll be listenin', you know; and then the door'll fly open, and they'll come tumblin' down the stairs, takin' the parcels out o' your arms and tryin' to guess whether it's apples or oranges that's in the big paper bag. And they'll drag at your coat till you're about wild, but you won't mind that; it's just their way o' bein' glad you're home again."

THE quiet even tone of the policeman seemed to have cast a curious spell over the man who listened. His head was raised just a little, and the thick lips parted as though, looking off into space, he saw in fact the things of which the other spoke.

Very quietly the officer went on with his story. "Then you comes into the room and there's the wife gettin' supper and somethin' boilin' and bubblin' in a kettle on the stove that's mighty appetizin'.

"Beef stew, Mary?" you asks. 'And did ye put in plenty of parsuips? Ye know right well I couldn't touch a mite of it if there wasn't some parsuips.' And the wife she laughs, and says she knew that, and she's fixed it just to suit ye. There's a baked Injun puddin' on the back of the range lookin' real rich and brown, and when ye see that you ketch the wife round the waist, pertendin' to be rough like, and you says to her, 'Mary, you got a temper like a wildcat, but you're a peach of a good cook.' And she just laughs again, knowin' you're only joshin' and not meanin' any harm about the temper."

"So after you've got washed up and yez all sits down to supper, and the first kid that turns over his plate, he gives a shout, and the second kid that turns over her plate, she gives a shout, for there under each little plate is a smart bright new nickel, and they all know who slipped it there; then the laughin' and shoutin' that goes on, and the jokes you've got to tell, and the jokes they've got to tell you till it's most scandalous uproarious, and the neighbors they all shakes their heads and they say, 'That Murphy family, they're that noisy, it's forever laughin' they are.'"

THE other man's face had grown tense and strained. He had forgotten the place in which they sat, forgotten the narrator and the child. The policeman's eyes, searching the man's face, narrowed curiously. Then he looked down at the sleeping child in his lap, and rising very quietly placed him in the other man's arms. The father seemed not to notice, though he unconsciously adjusted the little body against his great shoulder. The policeman went on more briskly:

"Well—then, tomorrow mornin' early you'll be callin' on my friend MaeNally, and he'll have had word that you're a-comin'. Better make it early, friend."

"Early, you bet!" answered the other under his breath.

"And don't you mind me friend MaeNally if he seems a bit short with you sometimes, for he don't mean no harm nor disrespect; it's just his way, mind ye, and if he seems to holler at ye at times, or gets somewhat impertinent, don't you go talkin' rough to him, for he's just as sensitive as a woman, and he don't like back talk. You just come and talk it over with me, and I'll speak to me friend about mendin' his manners."

The policeman rose, and the other man still holding the sleeping child, rose too. He seemed not quite awakened from the spell which the picture of a new home had cast over him. As he passed out from the swinging door, O'Toole, glancing back, noticed that the full glass still stood on the table untouched.

Together they walked the length of the block; then Murphy went on his way homeward alone. For a time the officer stood very still, looking anxiously after him, for indeed there had been little of the promise of which he spoke in the sodden, gloomy face of the man. At the door of his home the policeman saw him pause, and for an instant the big ugly head bent down till it touched the small one resting upon his shoulder. Then the patrolman drew a quick sigh of relief and walked rapidly back to his deserted beat.

As he regained his post he drew forth his watch and frowned. He had been absent for twenty minutes from his beat. He had been sitting inside a saloon and talking to a citizen! This was all conduct most unusual to Patrolman O'Toole. In perplexity he drew forth his notebook and pondered upon what entry he might make there, but there really seemed nothing to say.

Slowly he replaced the little book and shook his head at nobody in particular. "Sure a man can't be doin' his duty all the time," said Patrolman Patrick O'Toole.

As bees flock to the honey in the heart of the flower, so friends flock to the man or woman who has an appreciative heart.

The man who always stops to say, "What will I get?" will find his feet fast-mired in the marshes of selfishness.

Borden's Evaporated Milk

Good!—and Good for Him

You remember, don't you, how you waited 'round for the dasher. The memory of those treats you enjoyed is something you will treasure all of your life. Nothing tastes half so good, now. Home-made ice cream will bring equal joy, today, to your kiddies.

Leading dietitians recommend ice cream as one of the most nourishing and healthful of all foods.

Delicious ice cream is economical when made with Borden's Evaporated Milk—and you know that it is pure.

Reasons for Garnishing

From the Food Administration's
"War Cook Book"

MAKE the new foods appetizing and attractive," says the Food Administration's "War Cook Book"—for "by means of garnishes, sauces and judicious seasoning the housewife can make her family vote in favor of the new foods."

The Government also urges the use of perishable fruits.

So it is not only healthful but also helpful to garnish your foods with lemons.

Remember that fresh lemon juice is an aid to digestion.

And that people with jaded appetites who ought to eat are often tempted by a garnish.

Ask for California lemons. They are bright, clean, juicy, tart, and practically seedless.

Send a post card for free book, "Sunkist Recipes," containing recipes and suggestions for garnishing by Alice Bradley, Principal of Miss Farmer's School of Cookery, Boston.

Obeying God

International Sunday School Lesson for July 28. Matt. 4:18-22, John 14:22-24, James 1:22-27

By REV. GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

WE deal today with a fundamental virtue, obedience, without which no other is complete and few possible. The Ten Commandments exercised all their wonderful effects upon men's lives because obedience to them was expected as the very foundation of moral order in Israel. Samuel rightly placed the whole ritualistic system in the secondary place, saying, "To obey is better than sacrifice." Most philosophers have recognized that submission to rightful authority is a mark of a disciplined mind. Modern science consists in the discovery of laws obedience to which makes possible the remarkable output of our technical industries.

Yet of recent years there has been an increased tendency to lawlessness. Thoughtful observers have warned of dangers to come from the breakdown of obedience in the home, the State and the Church. Perhaps it is a good by-product of the awful war that a million or more of our young Americans are learning in camp the salutary lesson of prompt, exact, unquestioning obedience for the accomplishment of a great good common purpose.

The great cause of the Kingdom of God with all its implied blessings for the whole human family demands our unselfish ready obedience to the will of the Father. Jesus taught this. We see what disobedience does. May we not seize our chance to show our boys and girls how unhappy is a Bolshevik Russia, where every man does as he wishes, and how blessed is a free America, where nearly all obey the laws? As our patriotic people are learning to comply with every suggestion of the Food Administrator, the Secretary of the Treasury and the great President, and are putting aside personal inclinations in the matter of food, occupation, the use of their own money and time, shall we not reinforce the supreme duty of obeying God upon the hearts of Christians?

Obedience Based on Trust

There are all sorts of obedience, however. There is the slavish obedience based on fear. It accomplishes some results, but never the highest. The ideal of the Kingdom is not that of a submission to despotic authority apart from the allegiance of the spirit. There is a truckling, self-seeking obedience based on the hope of securing privileges and advantages. Christianity has no place for that. Obedience in the New Testament is based on the child's confidence in the Father's love. Its pattern is that rare and beautiful filial trust that abounds in a household where the children delight to do their parents' bidding, not for fear of punishments, nor in hope of rewards, but because "mother knows best" and "father must be right." That is a splendid story which tells of the lad out with his father in the jungle. Suddenly his father called out in subdued tones, "Stand perfectly still!" and leveled his gun apparently at his son. The boy obeyed unquestioningly. The gun boomed, and the charge of shot blew off the head of a deadly cobra scarce a yard from his foot.

Can it be, then, that we disobey through lack of faith? If we trusted more completely we would serve more perfectly. "If ye love me, ye will keep my commandments." As we read the Gospel record we find again and again that this disciple and that obeyed Jesus "straightway." That instant unquestioning response in every case is based on trust in him.

Christ, our mighty Captain, leads against the foe;
We will never falter when he bids us go;
Though his righteous purpose we may never know,
Yet we will follow all the way.

Obedience the Road to Fellowship

Perhaps the greatest reward of obedience is the sense of fellowship with God that it brings. If we obey his command we share his achievement and ultimately his presence.

In our second selection we learn that same lesson: obedience is the way to fellowship with the absent Jesus. Judas, not Iscariot, asked Christ what he meant by saying that he would manifest himself unto his disciples but not to the world. Jesus explained, "If a man love me he will keep my word; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him." He can only manifest himself to the obedient. Perhaps an illustration from our Sunday school will make this clearer to the boys. One of the scouts professed unbounded admiration of the scoutmaster, but persisted in breaking the rules and ignoring orders. Finally the time came when the scoutmaster planned a glorious trip in the mountains with his boys, but excluded that one lad from the party. The boy resented his ability to swim, to climb, to cook and signal. Besides, he had an automobile and plenty of money. The leader said, "I am very sorry, but you cannot go with me. I cannot depend upon you to obey. The safety and the success of the whole expedition might be endangered by you." Disobedience lost the scout the fellowship of his hero in tent and on the trail those golden days.

Trust, obedience, fellowship; that is the summary of true sainthood. Abraham, by faith, obeyed and was called the friend of God. Surely it is not by chance that obedience has the central place in the lives of the men of the Bible. They strove to achieve the wonderful epitaph awarded Joshua, "He left nothing undone of all that Jehovah commanded." Many of the best of us forget that the sins of omission hinder the coming of the Kingdom as much as the wilful evil-doings of the adversary. The surest way of all to be disobedient is to do nothing for Christ!

Obedience a Key to Progress

"To qualify for a commission as an officer the first requisite is to know how to obey." That is, promotion depends on obedience, and one cannot lead till he proves he can follow. The wise son of the great ironmaster begins at the bottom in the factory and by submitting to the hours, the tasks, and the rules becomes in time a real partner of his father and not a mere figurehead. Even Jesus, though he was a Son, learned obedience by the things which he suffered. For it is supremely true in spiritual realms that obedience alone makes progress possible. Would you rise to greater usefulness? Then obey God in the full use of your talents, such as they are, and more will be added unto you. Would you be mighty in service and do some great things for Christ? Then do with your might what your hands find to do, and when the big call comes you will obey it just as surely. Would you grow in knowledge and all discernment? "If any man will to do his will he shall know of the teaching." That is, obey and you will certainly come to understand. But obey first.

Not Theory but Practice Makes the Christian

Our third text is from James's common-sense chapter on obedience. He rightly says that Christians are doers and not simply hearers or talkers. "Not every one that sayeth Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father." Put it simply and plainly to yourself: the obedient are the men of the Kingdom. Not what I believe, though I be never so orthodox; nor what I seem to others or myself to be; but what I do for Christ determines my standing before the Almighty. Missions call: the nation needs us: daily life challenges to service: these are God's commands. Through Jesus Christ we have received grace and apostleship unto obedience in faith among all nations for his name's sake.

Marion Harland's Corner

Hints and Helps from Our Letter-Box

WE LAY before our members to-day matter, timely and friendly, supplied by our growing family of well-wishers and well-doers. Each contribution has character and value of its own. The Corner cannot fail to grow richer in all that makes for the good of the household when we have such coadjutors.

In a late issue of the Corner I notice a request from "Mrs. D. M. D. H." for a buckwheat cake made like johnnycake. In our neighborhood such a cake has been much used during the past winter and is a general favorite—either hot or cold.

The general rule is based on this unit: one cup buckwheat flour; one-third cup wheat flour; one-half teaspoon salt; one tablespoon sugar (or molasses); one-half teaspoon soda if sour milk is used, or one teaspoon of baking powder if the milk is sweet, and a tablespoon melted shortening. This makes a cake for two, and may be multiplied according to size of family. The quantity of milk is hard to measure, especially if sour milk is used, but the batter is right when it drops from the spoon in a "ropy" consistency, little thicker than would be right for griddle cakes. Bake in shallow pan in oven hot enough for biscuit.

I note also an inquiry concerning dry yeast. My experience has been that a certain dry cake made with cornmeal as a basis is in every way the equal of the moist compressed yeast cakes and will keep indefinitely.

I always read all the "housekeeper's columns" in the various magazines we take, but this is the first time I have ventured to add my "bit." Susie Q. D. (New Hampshire).

May we not hope that the cordial reception your several "bits" must meet with from the family at large, including the editor, will encourage you to tell us of more things which, having been helpful to you, will ease the labors of other house mothers? "Pass it on" should be one of our most lively working mottoes.

I have a grandson who is an architect. I have been trying to impress upon his mind the importance in his plans of homes to give sufficient thought to the room where food is kept. Plan one large enough to contain the refrigerator, and plenty of shelves.

These strenuous times impress us with the importance of the right use of our products. You mentioned potato peelings. If one has hens or anything outside to feed they will not be wasted. When boiled with skins on, the best of them will go to the table, and so with fruits. Mrs. S. B. W. (Oklahoma).

I wish I had the time and space I could use profitably in enlarging upon your criticism of the gross faults in the arrangement of the housemother's workshop. Perhaps when more women are professional architects we shall have as much care bestowed upon these as is now given to factories and machine-shops. Much food becomes stale or sour because the refrigerator is absurdly small for the uses to which a family of moderate size should put it. In Oklahoma you have room for houses of convenient size. The cottager and flat-dweller has continual occasion to reprobate the architect who never bethinks himself of the humane devices which might save many a useful life.

We thank you for recipes enclosed. They will appear in good time.

During the summer months I cook on a two-burner gasoline stove, as we have no gas in this town. I used to experience endless trouble in preparing a meal for a family on a two-burner stove, and yet get it all to the table hot and appetizing. No small feat, as you will agree if you have ever tried it! Last spring I hunted up about eight halves of old unglazed bricks, and put them to soak in coal oil, in a tightly covered vessel. To use these shake down all ashes from the kitchen range, place from a half to a whole brick in the fire-box, light it, and presto! the stove gets hot almost instantly. Dishes can be warmed, and food kept warm for at least thirty minutes on half a brick. This simple scheme enables one to cook a large meal on a two-burner gasoline stove, without the first dishes getting cold before the others are done. Great caution of course should be used to keep the vessel containing the oil and bricks away from danger of young children and matches. Also be very sure a used brick is absolutely cold before replacing it in the coal oil.

I trust these hints will be of value to some of the sisters, as I, in turn, am looking forward to deriving great pleasure and profit from our Kitchen Corner. Mrs. H. L. D. (Colorado).

Our Colorado constituent never puts pen to paper without profit to those she claims as sisters. A veritable Sisterhood of Mercy she and her congeners are making of our Comfort Corner. Having seen the oil-soaked bricks used to signal advantage in heating fireless rooms, I am prepared to testify to the practicability of the contrivance.

I am enclosing my recipe for the wished-for loaf of substitutes, as they all say it is just fine. It will make six loaves.

Boil one large potato and "rice" it. Scald three tablespoons flour in the water in which the potato was boiled. Add three teaspoons sugar, cool to luke-warmth; add one yeast-cake (previously soaked in lukewarm water). Stir this for five minutes; cover for the night. Next morning add three-quarters of a quart of lukewarm water. Take four cups of "shorts," (secured at a mill or feed-store at about two cents per pound), one and one-half cups cornmeal, one and one-half cups rye flour or barley flour, one and one-half cups oatmeal, previously soaked in boiling water. When it is lukewarm add it. Salt to taste and work, adding some wheat flour at last. If you do not have it, use "shorts" instead. You can use all other substitutes, such as boiled rice (cooled), mashed potatoes, rice flour and corn flour. Knead this bread well; let it rise; put into pans for second rising and bake slowly in a hot oven for one hour. Use four kinds of "substitutes" for one baking. I only use lard or shortening enough for greasing the dough all over, or for the baking-pans. This recipe makes very light bread. Let "shorts" be the main part of it. Mrs. J. C. (Nebraska).

We have had so many inquiries concerning what a witty correspondent calls "the sundry-substitutes loaf" that your communication is especially acceptable. So far as I can judge, it covers the ground completely. There is a touch of pathos which goes to the heart in the determination to compensate to one's household for the lack of the beloved wheaten loaf by every ingenious "blend" the mother can devise. An Englishwoman, visiting this country, has published lately a clever article in a leading monthly, in which she tells us that American housemothers have not yet begun to feel the privations and sacrifices which English women are enduring with high courage and cheerful resignation. When that day comes to us, we shall not be found wanting. Our Cornerites are giving ample proof of that!

INQUIRIES touching dry yeast are so numerous and pressing that we make room here and now for a letter from one who is fully advised upon the important subject.

Having used dry yeast for a long time I have no hesitation in submitting to my fellow members of the Corner Club the following facts:

Dry yeast is used by millions of families, especially those who live in the country and in small towns where it is a geographical necessity on account of its keeping qualities. It is used by many people in the cities because of its inexpensiveness.

The only difference between dry and compressed yeast is the difference in the state of growth of the yeast plants. In compressed yeast the minute yeast plants are given commercial bulk by being added to a small wet cake of tapioca flour. In these the yeast plants are actively growing, and the cake of compressed yeast must be used for bread-making almost immediately after being removed from the grocer's ice-box.

In dry yeast the same kind of yeast plants are added to a cake of cornmeal to give commercial bulk. In the dry yeast cake the yeast plant is dormant, quickly reviving and rapidly multiplying when dissolved and added to the bread sponge.

Probably 75 per cent. of the 13,500,000 families who bake their own bread at home use dry yeast. Consequently the prevailing practice in making homemade bread employs the over-night sponge method, which is necessary when dry yeast is used. The over-night method consists of making a sponge the night before, of water, yeast, and a portion of the flour.

In the city, where mostly compressed yeast is used, the customary method of making bread is the five-hour dough process, commonly known as the straight "dough method." In this process the materials are mixed in the morning, and the baking done the same day.

Dry yeast is obtainable at all grocery stores. Compressed yeast is for sale principally in the cities, but in many small towns and rural districts it is not known because of its lack of keeping qualities.

There is no difference in the quality of bread made with dry or compressed yeast; both make good bread. FAITHFUL CORNERITE (Connecticut).

ORDER THIS FLAG TODAY

UNFURL IT EVERY DAY

THE least thing you can do for your country is to—show its flag. Let your neighbors know that yours is a patriotic home. Stand solidly behind the great principles of Freedom and Human Rights and let the flag tell it. At this critical time in the history of your country you should pledge your allegiance by displaying the Stars and Stripes.

Here is the very flag you have wanted—a large-sized "Old Glory" six feet long by four feet wide. It will add much to your celebration of National Holidays and local celebrations when the American Flag is indispensable.

The illustration is an actual photographic reproduction of this splendid large flag. To insure durability the stripes are double-stitched. Excellent bright colors, guaranteed not to fade or shrink. Pole is not included.

We make it easy for you to secure this splendid large flag. By placing an order for thousands of these flags we were able to purchase them at a considerable reduction. We will give you the benefit of this saving, and have made the terms so liberal that all may take advantage of this offer,—half the price of a similar flag if purchased in a store and at a time when it is most needed.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

THESE are the days of open church windows, dear country neighbors; and of doors ajar! Artnfuls of daisies and sweet-smelling grasses are banked about the walls!

And with your voices, as they rise in the hymns you love, runs an accompaniment of bird-notes from without, while every window frames a nodding rose-spray or a rustling tree or a distant green hill, or, perhaps, a reach of sky as mildly blue as a baby's eyes.

Sitting thus, with all the glory of God's handiwork about you, you find, settling on your war-troubled heart, that "peace which passeth understanding." You look about you—at the old folks you have always known and the young folks fast growing into manhood and womanhood—with a new love. And even the needy little church itself, with its blistered paint and shabby carpet and battered pews, will bring tears and smiles to your eyes. A thousand and poignant memories will rush in on you. Yet, as you sit there, gazing about you, it may suddenly be brought home to you that of late years you have done very little for that church and its flock; that the other members (as busy and self-absorbed as you) have also done little; and that the church is crumbling and its attendance falling off.

Shocked, you will straighten up and look around you. Yes (you will exclaim to yourself), ah, yes; there are many empty pews! There are few new faces! And surely, many more young folks used to attend! Where are the boys and girls? What has overtaken the thriving little church of several years ago?

Deeply distressed, you will try to figure it all out. Perhaps the church's decline first set in when the Christian Endeavor Society was discontinued; or when the weekly "evening of singing" was abandoned. The young folks had loved both. Or—more likely—the tragedy is due to a growing apathy on the part of every one; a kind of paralyzing indifference.

This (you will conclude) is the real trouble; and this you will determine to combat.

As soon, therefore, as the service is over, you will commence your effort to awaken your neighbors. Enlisting the aid of your minister, you will set out on a campaign of rejuvenation which, perhaps, will begin with a fresh coat of paint and end with the refounding of all the vital organizations that are the very pulse-beats of a rural church.

WHAT will be the result of it all? Discouragement? Failure? Ah, dear adventurers, read the following accounts from other men and women all over the land, and, taking heart, plunge into the problem at hand!

Repairing a Shabby Church

Last year a few ladies in this community took it into their heads to have their church repaired. It was one of the oldest in the Association, and one of the worst-looking. We met and decided we would get each lady to bake a cake. We then appointed two ladies to take these cakes to our nearest village (Victoria, Virginia), and sell them. The cakes were baked, soon sold, and brought us in about ten dollars. This was a beginning. We next sold butter, chickens, walnuts, canned fruit, and anything else we could spare from our farms. We also had box parties: the young people taking part and enjoying them immensely.

Then we wrote to our married daughters who had once worshiped in this old building but had moved away to new homes, asking them to give one dollar each. This they gave gladly; and some wrote beautiful letters which showed how they enjoyed the giving. We next wrote to all our former church members who had left the county. These, too, gave readily.

We then asked everyone we met who attended the church to give as much as possible. I'm glad to say nearly all have given something. This church now has a splendid roof, three coats of good paint, and good cement steps. It looks so much better that we love to meet there. Of course, the men helped some; and some gave money liberally. But the ladies had to push the work. I hope this account may help some other neighbors to repair their old church building.

MRS. W. A. WILSON.

That adventure pleased me mightily, because the sums raised were so modest, and the struggle to raise them so heroic. I cannot help but feel that every one of those hard-earned dollars brought a spiritual blessing with it.

OUR next adventure offers the solution of the "boy" problem: describing how one Sunday school teacher prevented the boys of her church from drifting away. If one church can do this, why not yours, and mine?

"The Straight Line Club"

A few years ago I was a teacher in the Sunday school here, and one problem that faced us was the 'teen-age boys' indifference to Sunday school. There were plenty of 'teen-age boys in our little town, but only one or two came to Sunday school; and even they were getting discouraged and talking of quitting.

I suggested a boys' club; as the 'teen-age girls were already successfully organized. So we persuaded a few of them to talk the matter over. The first meeting was called at my home, and we chose for the name of our organization, "The Straight Line Club," selecting strawberry and cream for our club colors. As badges, we ordered strawberry-colored neckties, with the letters S. L. C. in cream-color on them. Our motto was "To be happy is to please." And we added this explanation: "Truest happiness is found in pleasing God the whole year round." Our club meetings were to be held on Friday evenings at my home.

When this was fairly under way, the boys flocked in. They made their own rules, and no one was allowed to join our club who was not a member of our Sunday school class. This they rigidly enforced.

What times we did have! Our evenings were divided between music, literary programs and games: with refreshments before going home. Once a month we had a joint meeting with the girls' club, and now and then a sleigh ride or a party at some member's home.

Through it all, however, the best that was in me I gave to the Sunday school hour. I studied and prayed that naught but truth should be presented then, and I never faced my class without offering up a prayer for help.

This class continued successfully for three years, enrolling almost all the boys in town. A year ago came the stirring call to war. My "Straight Line Boys," then budding into manhood, were among the first to go. Seven or eight enlisted; others were drafted. Our first president has been in the trenches and

HE that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

1 I will say of the LORD, He is my refuge and my fortress: my God, in him will I trust.

2 Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence.

3 He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: his truth shall be thy shield and buckler.

4 Nor for the terror by night: nor for the arrow that flieth by day;

5 Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noon-day.

6 A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee.

7 Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked.

8 Because thou hast made the LORD, which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation;

9 There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling.

10 For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.

11 They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone.

12 Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet.

13 Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name.

14 He shall call upon me, and I will answer him: will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honour him.

15 With long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation.

16 With long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation.

"over the top." His companion at his side paid the supreme price; but he as yet is untouched. Others are in cantonments and training camps.

The Sunday school is now making a service flag to be dedicated on Children's Day. There are nine stars on it now, and others will soon follow: all my boys. My prayer to God is that some little truth gleaned in the happy hours of youth may go with these boys through the dark days of war, drawing them nearer to Him whose own blood was shed, and who says: "I will not leave you comfortless."

MRS. P. G. KIBBEY.

Our most earnest good wishes, fellow adventurers, to that dear Sunday school teacher and her lads in khaki!

WE come now to a brief but delightful little adventure in neighboring which, I think, will contain a hint for other Ladies' Aids.

Buying Church Furniture

Our Ladies' Aid raised some money toward buying church furniture by each member taking fifty cents and investing it in some way so as to earn all that was possible in a given time.

Then we had a social at the home of one of the members. The whole community was invited; and every one came. After listening to some good music and recitations, each one who had entered the contest read an original poem, and presented her earnings to the treasury. In most every case the poem (?) was a first attempt at writing rhyme. Each was received with a great deal of interest, and caused much laughter and fun.

Afterward we enjoyed a good country supper, for which a small sum was charged; bringing the whole amount raised up to nearly a hundred dollars. The remainder needed was then subscribed by one of the guests.

Our working in harmony for the same purpose resulted in one of the most successful "Adventures in Neighboring" our little place had experienced in a long time.

MRS. D. Z. GIBBS.

I do hope, neighbors, the Ladies' Aid in your town will try out this jolly plan. And I hope, too, that if it does you will share with each other, and with me, your various experiences with the investment of the half-dollar. I can imagine all sorts of amusing and ingenious expedients being resorted to by the determined investors!

MEANTIME, let us smile with this next neighbor over the novel way in which a little church in a New York town finally achieved its fresh coat of paint.

Picking Hops to Paint Church

In the pretty rural town of Fort Covington, in my girlhood days, there were three churches that had bells. The Presbyterian and the Methodist churches had been entirely renovated and altered to agree with modern ideas; but the small Baptist Church had merely been "rejuvenated," to use an expression we young folks thought quite appropriate—only the interior being touched. We had the smallest congregation, and no doubt the leanest purses. Nevertheless, we were a proud-spirited and energetic congregation.

We decided it wouldn't do to solicit any more eggs from our farmers, nor more material from them for ice cream, suppers or dinners. Yet—something must be done to paint and decorate the outside of the building. For, as the bells rang out, Sunday mornings, the Presbyterian bell seemed to say quite sedately: "Spie and Span: Within, Without." Then the Methodist bell would say blithely: "Clean as a Whistle: Outside and In." Then quite remotely would chime in the wail of the Baptist bell: "Dainty Within: Dingy Without."

Some one in the church owned a small hop-yard, and needed pickers. The Ladies' Aid proffered its services, which were gladly accepted.

It was all quite a lark to us younger ones; and we sang and jested and felt elated to think we were filling our boxes faster than our elders. But, alas! The manager told us that there were too many leaves and stems; and we must pick cleaner! So we found the old Proverb, "Haste makes waste," to be true. For we had to sort our hops over.

In time, the church was painted with a new white dress and green-trimmed blinds; and a sailor who came to town just then climbed up the steeple and gilded the top. (Alan Friday, the boys dubbed him.) The whole town rejoiced over the changed appearance of our church. And fixing up buildings must be "catching," for from that time onward, ours was a paint-up, fix-up era. ALMA H. CULVER.

Can't you see those stanch members of that Ladies' Aid defying the hot sun and the prickly rash that comes from handling hops, as they labored for a new dress for their beloved little church building? I can.

AND now, fellow adventurers, we come to today's Forum. The subject of renovating and reviving our rural churches has barely been touched in these columns. The whole problem is too big, too complex, for adequate handling in our little neighboring corner. All I hoped, or dreamed, in reminding you today of this subject so dear to our hearts, was that this little friendly word might set you to thinking. I have other rural church adventures to publish. They will appear later. For this brief chat is by no means my final word.

Meantime, fellow adventurers, until another two weeks have rolled around I shall not see your faces or clasp your hands; but I will be thinking of you and planning for you the most inspiring meeting of the summer.

The Neighbors' Forum

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: If you know of any blind girls or women, lonely old ladies, or girls or women who have tuberculosis and who have NO ONE AT ALL for company, or to care for them: please let it be known through the columns of the Christian Herald; or let me know. MISS G.

I am very anxious to get the Christian Herald readers interested in writing to our soldier boys and being their friends. I have had the greatest pleasure and satisfaction in doing this, ever since last December. Ten addresses were given me by a pastor of a church; and I got in touch with the boys at once; writing to them and sending them some little gifts. They were very grateful, as they are lonely in the camps, sometimes. I hope my neighbors will obtain a list of addresses from their pastors, and set to work. A NEIGHBOR.

I wonder if my neighbors know that they can make wallpaper-cleaner that is much better than the kind we buy! I have a good recipe that I will send if any one wants it. MISS P. B.

DEAR NEIGHBORS: Invite some shut-in out for a day of relief from four walls and her own thoughts. This was done recently for me, it seemed like fairyland. A SHUT-IN.

A Vow and a Gift

SOME time ago I registered a vow that so long as my boy was in the trenches in France (and he has been in a New Zealand Rifle Brigade for over two years), or so long as the war lasts, if he dies there, I will not attend any more dinners but will use the money that otherwise I would spend therefor to help some cause in some way connected with war work, ordinarily to the Red Cross. After careful consideration, I have reached the conclusion that your work at present comes within that class, and therefore from such fund I enclose my check No. 3325 on the Savings Union Bank and Trust Company, payable to your order for three dollars, and shall rejoice to believe that this small sum (which I wish I could multiply a thousand times) will send a child to Mont-Lawn for ten days. That's better than attending a banquet of the California Bar Association. R. S. G.

For Armenia's Sake

American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, Caucasus Branch, Erian, April 26, 1918

AT the meeting of the Caucasus Branch of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief held at the United States Consulate, Tiflis, Russia, on March 22, 1918, it was moved by Consul F. Willoughby Smith and seconded by the Rev. Mr. Partridge and unanimously voted that a vote of thanks be given to you, the Christian Herald, for the loan of your correspondent, Mr. Owen Maynard Williams, who for three months did vitally helpful work in augmenting the Committee at work for the Armenian refugees in the Caucasus. Mr. Williams was alone in Van for three months, and did work that there would have been no one to do if you had not so kindly and generously loaned him. We are deeply grateful to you and to him. For the Committee, H. H. WHITE, Secretary. On the Volga River, Russia.

Hearts Touched by Suffering

FRIENDS in Danville, Ill., write: "Enclosed find check for War Widows and Armenian and Syrian relief. Please use for the same unless the Master directs you to some place else where the need is greater. May God direct and bless you and your co-workers of the Christian Herald in all your work for suffering humanity in this time of stress and suffering. MR. AND MRS. W. E. LYNCH."

With the foregoing there was enclosed a check for $1,000. This generous gift has been applied in equal shares to the Armenian and Syrian Relief Fund and the War Widows and Orphans Fund.

OFFICIAL WAR MAPS

WE have just completed arrangements to procure for readers of the Christian Herald the three special World's War Charts published by Encyclopædia Britannica. These three charts have been especially prepared by the editors of the Encyclopædia Britannica—from official maps used by the High Commands and are authoritative.

Three Britannica World's War Maps

Beautifully printed in four colors, size 31x39 inches

Showing all the Belligerent Countries and the Battle Fronts. They also show where all other world wars for the past 6,000 years were fought

MAP No. 1—Covering Northwestern Europe and showing the Western Front

This map includes the North Sea, the English Channel, England, Holland, Belgium, France, Germany west of Berlin.

Map No. 2—Covering Central Europe from the Baltic to the Black Sea, and showing the Eastern Front

This map includes the Baltic Sea, part of Sweden, Germany east of Berlin, Poland, Austria-Hungary, Galicia, and European Russia.

MAP No. 3—Covering Southeastern Europe, the Balkans, Turkey in Asia, Mesopotamia and the Holy Land and showing the Italian, Balkan and Turkish Fronts

On this map we find a strange intermingling of what is very old in the history of the world with what is very new. The mysticism of the East is found side by side with the pushing, practical forcefulness of the West.

These maps are official—that is, made from Government surveys. Exactly the same maps on a larger scale are used by the High Commands on all fronts. Added to each map is much readable and instructive historical matter—just what everyone needs to follow this war intelligently.

“LIGHT ON PROPHECY”

REPORT OF THE PHILADELPHIA PROPHETIC CONFERENCE, MAY 28 TO 30, 1918

THE unanimous judgment is that the great Philadelphia Bible Conference was the most momentous and important of its kind ever held in America, or perhaps in the world, both in numbers and significance. Many of the speakers declared from the platform that they had never faced such multitudes of deeply earnest searchers of the Bible. It was a Conference which at every session exalted Christ, and gave rich and stirring messages to His people throughout the world. There was no effort on the part of any speaker to exploit himself. From first to last, there was evidence in all that was said, that the most consecrated scholarship and reverent investigation was under divine guidance, and submissive to the leadings of the Holy Spirit. There was an entire absence of anything like radicalism, sensationalism, date-fixing, and dogmatism. The great fundamental belief of the Christian Church was discussed with a calm serenity that indicated conviction of its truth. The immense gatherings, from first to last, had the spirit of American loyalty combined with the great Christian hope, exemplified in a remarkable degree. The speeches of the Conference will be welcomed by Christians and Bible readers everywhere, and especially by those who love the Lord Jesus Christ and believe in His promise. These addresses have been gathered under the official supervision of the Conference Executive Committee, and published by the Christian Herald in an authorized volume of some 300 pages under the title of “Light on Prophecy.” This step was taken by the Conference in order that the widest possible publicity might be assured for the book, as the record of the most authoritative assembly on prophecy ever held up to the present time.

NOTABLE ADDRESSES INCLUDED IN “LIGHT ON PROPHECY”

“Hath God Spoken?” and “What is to Become of the Church?”
By Dr. Harris H. Gregg, Pastor, Canada.
“What is Prophecy?” and
“Where is Christ Now and What Is He Doing?”
By Rev. John MacInnes of Syracuse.
“The Doctrine of Our Lord’s Return”
By Dr. Mark A. Matthews, Former Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church.
“The Answer to the Greatest Question Jesus Ever Asked” and
“What Manner of Persons Ought We to Be?”
By Dr. William B. Riley, Minneapolis.
“Did the Cross of Christ Fulfill All the Promises?” and “The Coming Glory.”
By W. L. Pettingill, Philadelphia.
“Regathering of Israel in Unbelief” and “God’s Purpose in This Dispensation”
By Dr. James M. Gray, Chicago.

“The Capture of Jerusalem”

profits allowed by the regulations of the Food Administration, 45 cents or over profit per barrel having been charged as against 25 cents allowed by the Commission. For this the millers were ordered by the Food Administration, on June 17, to return to the Government in the shape of flour at a $1.00 a barrel all such excess profits. The investigation of the Board on which the report was based was made primarily to afford Congress a basis for excess profit taxation in the new Revenue Bill.

GERMANY WILL INTERVENE. It was announced in London, on June 30, that Germany was preparing to send troops into Russia to restore order and to prevent the overthrow of the Bolsheviks. It was also reported that German and Finnish troops were organizing an expedition to extend Finnish control over the Murman Railway from Petrograd to the Arctic coast ports of Russia being held by American, French and English marines. A declaration of war by Finland upon the Allies was reported imminent on July 5.

Following a report that General Foch and the Versailles Council had urged military intervention in Russia, President Wilson and his cabinet held several long sessions and it was said, on July 6, that Washington was preparing to bow to the judgment of the Allies, but would seek to have the intervention take the form more of economic and civil assistance than of military force. The people of the Murman coast on the Arctic about Kola and Archangel were reported on July 7 to have seceded from the Bolshevik government of Russia and to have declared themselves allies of the Entente. Provisions were arriving at Kola from the United States. Assassins entered the German embassy at Moscow on July 6 and killed Count von Mirbach, German Ambassador to what is left of Russia. The Bolshevik government promptly made its apologies to Germany, declaring the act a political maneuver to provoke trouble. Kerensky, in Paris, expressed the opinion that Germany would make the loss of her ambassador an excuse for the occupation of Moscow.

HOSPITAL SHIP TORPEDOED, 234 LOST. On the night of June 27 the British hospital ship, Llandovery Castle, returning from Canada with its crew and men and women of the Army Medical Corps, was torpedoed 70 miles off the Irish coast. The submarine, after the sinking of the ship, cruised up and down among the lifeboats smashing and sinking many of them. There were 14 nurses on the boat and 8 members of the medical corps in addition to the crew, the total being 258. Of these 234 had been given up as lost on July 2.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. A strike of the Union telegraphers in the employ of the Western Union Telegraph Company having been called for July 8, President Wilson on July 1 in a memorandum to Congress asked for authority in case of military necessity to take over and operate the telephone and telegraph systems of the company. The House, on July 5, passed a resolution conferring the necessary power on the Chief Executive. The Senate proposed a recess of six weeks, but the house refusing to agree the Senate prepared to consider the proposition at once. Meantime the strike was called off after Secretary of Labor Wilson and Samuel Gompers had strongly advised this course. . . . The Senate, on June 29, in four hours, passed appropriation bills, amounting to $20,000,000,000, among which were the Army appropriation bill carrying $12,089,000,000, and the fortifications bill carrying $5,500,000,000. . . . The Y. M. C. A., on July 7, launched a campaign of one week for Hut Secretaries for France, 4000 men between the ages of 31 and 50, of unusual ability, possessing real leadership, being required, to enable the association to do its work abroad. . . . Senator Benjamin R. Tillman of South Carolina was stricken with paralysis on July 30 and died July 31. . . . The Thrift Drive which terminated on June 28 was reported, on July 1, to have been a complete success, although the total of subscriptions were not yet available. . . . Mohammed V, Sultan of Turkey since the Young Turks deposed his brother Abdul Hamid in 1909, died in Constantinople July 4. There were rumors that, like many of his Armenian subjects, he had not died a natural death and that revolution was brewing in the sick member of the quartet of central Europe. . . . Czechoslovak troops on July 4 were in complete control of Vladivostok, where they had suppressed the Bolshevik Soviet and had disarmed all opponents. . . . The United States transport “Covington,” 16,339 tons, formerly the Hamburg American Liner “Cincinnati,” was torpedoed on the night of July 1 by a German submarine while returning to America under convoy. Six firemen were reported missing. . . . An excursion boat carrying 500 people was wrecked on July 6 in the Illinois River, south of Peoria, Ill. On July 7, 77 bodies had been recovered and 22 persons was still missing. . . . Potato rations in Germany were cut one-third on July 8. German crops were reported as greatly injured by cold in June and excessive rains in July.

and seven of its owners are in active service in the Army, Navy and Red Cross.

FORMERLY great stress was put upon the microscopical examination of pork for parasites known as trichinae. This has been abandoned because the government found it impossible to determine positively, under any known method of inspection, whether the muscle tissue of pork contained this organism. But inasmuch as live trichinae are dangerous to health, it is provided that no article of a kind prepared customarily to be eaten without cooking shall contain this tissue of pork, unless subjected to a temperature sufficient to destroy these murderous pests. The only safe way, however, is to avoid the eating of raw pork products.

Not only must the packers follow the procedures laid down by the Bureau, but the plants themselves must meet the specifications and all plans must be filed. The regulations require a very stringent sanitary layout. Contamination is guarded against at every turn. Everywhere immense quantities of water are used in cleansing. Meat trucks are immersed daily in tanks of boiling lye, and then rinsed in scalding water, washed and scraped. Tables, too, are scraped and scalded. At frequent intervals you see sterilizing apparatus for implements and hands. The cloths used for wiping are constantly disinfected. Nowhere in all those enormous establishments can you detect the odor of decaying flesh.

And considering the nature of the products, there were not many flies. A most aggressive campaign is waged against them. There is also a continuous offensive against rats.

Altogether, the governmental inspection of meats is a monumental piece of constructive work, worthy of this nation and the Allied cause.

Crooked Boards

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A CARPENTER had come to fix our back fence, and I was watching him with interest and enthusiasm. For our back fence—a particularly drab-colored, sagging one—had long been an eyesore to me.

"It will be a relief," I said to the carpenter, as he jerked the palings apart, "to know that those old boards have been thrown away, and that there are new, straight boards in their places!"

The carpenter was a white-haired, kindly old man. He paused in his work, and laughed.

"Bless you," he told me very amusedly, "we don't throw lumber away—not this year. It's worth too much. This lumber's goin' right back into your fence again!"

I was keenly disappointed.

"But if you put those old boards back again, the fence won't ever look any better than it does now!"

The carpenter resumed his work of pulling palings apart. But over his shoulder he addressed me soothingly.

"Don't you worry about this fence," he told me. "It'll be the best-looking fence on this street when I get through with it! And as for the boards—why, they're all right. They've just gotten a little crooked, and they need a coat of paint, but when I set 'em up straight, an' get after 'em with a brush, they'll be fine. Don't you worry!"

Off and on, all during one morning, I watched the mending of that fence. I saw the carpenter stretch a string from one corner of our yard to the other and saw him build the fence along the slender white guiding line of it. I saw the old boards that had drooped so half-heartedly take on the semblance of soldiers drilling in a regular, measured row. And then I saw the first coat of paint applied—the coat of paint that covered the weather-beaten palings with a new glory.

"Well," I said to the carpenter, as he went luncheonward at noontime, "you were right. It's the nicest fence on this block! And no one would ever recognize the boards as the same crooked old things they used to be. I think that you were quite wonderful to make it so."

The carpenter shook his white head deprecatingly as he smiled at me.

"Why, it's my business," he told me, "making new fences out of old ones! If I couldn't make crooked palings stand straight I wouldn't be a carpenter!" And he shook hands with me, quite warmly, and left.

DICK had always been a failure at everything. He was like our back fence—a drab-colored, sagging object, that didn't seem to have much reason for existence. When he was put at any task he failed—failed miserably. When he was trusted with something important the trust was betrayed; not maliciously, but because he hadn't the backbone to stand firmly on his two feet, with his chin in the air, and face the world.

And then the war came. And Dick, the failure, was drafted. He was put, quite unresisting, into a khaki suit, and a gun was thrust into his hand, and he was shoved into a line and told to drill.

He had always been a failure—a prosaic, drab-colored failure—and so, when I saw him the week after he was sent to training-camp, I found myself pitying him—a distinctly unmilitary figure, in war-trappings that did not seem to fit. And then, for over a month, I did not see him. And when I did . . .

He was standing erect, as he had never stood before in his life; and as I looked into his eyes, I could see the spark of a soul glowing there. He held his gun as the other soldiers held theirs, and he marched as they marched. And his shoulders were thrust back, and his mouth was set in a determined line. I watched him at drill, and after drill was over, I sought him out and talked with him in a confidential way.

"Dick," I said, "I'd never know you for the same boy who went away a month ago. You've changed a lot!"

Dick grinned—a whole-hearted, American-soldier sort of a grin.

"We've got a sergeant," he told me, "who'd put pep into a wooden Indian. When he tells us to stand up straight we stand up straight. When he tells us to throw our shoulders back we throw 'em back—hard. When he tells us to drill, we drill! We" (was there a flicker of pride in the eyes that had been so dull) "we've got the best section in the regiment, we have!"

Later in the day I met the sergeant. He was a brown little man, with a steady gaze and a boyish laugh.

"I hear," I told him, "that you've got the best section in your regiment. And I can well believe it," I added, "after seeing what you did for Dick!"

The sergeant was frankly embarrassed.

"That's nothin'," he murmured. "If I couldn't help set up the fellers they wouldn't've made me a sergeant. It's my job!"

Dick was a failure—a sagging, drab-colored failure—like my fence. It took war, and the training and discipline of war, to wake him up, to make of him a worth-while citizen. And his sergeant was the carpenter who stood him firmly on his two feet and painted him with the new glory of a fine resolution.

I LIKE to think that most human failures are like the palings in my fence—made of good lumber, with possibilities for infinite usefulness. And I like to think that the Great Carpenter is going, some day, to make them into worth-while, upstanding figures, and to renew their worn, weather-beaten surfaces with the spirit of high purpose.

The Great Carpenter has many trained workmen. I think a sergeant who can make a man out of a spineless creature may be one of those master workmen. I think that each teacher, or minister, or business man or woman, who has to do with the guiding of other people may be one. And I think, too, that it lies in our power to become, each of us, a capable assistant to the Great Carpenter—just by showing that there is good timber in us and that we may some day qualify to help others to stand erect before the world.

A Teacher's Testimony

SOME months ago Miss Lura L. Perrine, a teacher in North Dakota, wrote to the Christian Herald calling attention to the frequent occasions when the Mail-Bag page was printed on the back of the first cover. She said that she liked to frame the beautiful covers for use in her school, and she also found the items in the Mail-Bag very useful in her school work, but she could not cut up the Mail-Bag page and also frame the cover, when both were on the same sheet. The editor wrote her explaining some of the problems involved in the placing of the pages. In a recent letter Miss Perrine says: "Aside from a host of uses for the Christian Herald, it is a most useful and helpful teacher's weekly, an aid to the study of current events as well as geography and biography. I consider it one of the finest weeklies for the rural teacher."

Corn Puffs

Bubbles of Hominy

Raindrop Size—Queen of All the Dainties

This is to lovers of Puffed Grains who have overlooked Corn Puffs. And to others who are missing this delight.

This is not whole corn. It is pellets of hominy, puffed to raindrop size. It is airy bubbles, sweet and toasted, flimsy, crisp and flavory.

Toasted corn, you know, has the finest flavor ever attained in a grain food.

Here is inner corn that's super-toasted by an hour of fearful heat. So the flavor is multiplied.

Then the tiny pellets are steam-exploded—puffed to eight times former size. Thus the toasted corn becomes thin globules, ready to crush at a touch.

There is nothing like them. You will be amazed that such fascinating morsels can be made from corn alone.

All Shot from Guns

Corn Puffs—like all the Puffed Grains—are made by Prof. Anderson's process. All are shot from guns. Every food cell is exploded, so that every atom feeds.

You are learning more of corn in these days. Don't overlook this supreme corn creation.

Puffed Corn Puffed
Rice Puffs Wheat

Each 15c Except in Far West

Food Confections

Float in Milk

Buttered or salted, like peanuts or popcorn, Corn Puffs are confections. Eat them dry.

Or, lightly butter and crisp them before adding sugar and cream, and you'll multiply the flavor.

For luncheons or suppers serve in milk. For dinners, use them to garnish your ice cream, or scatter in your soups.

Use them like nut meats in home candy making.

Woman's Part in Foreign Missions

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Acts 16:14, 15

AMONG the company of the disciples there were many women, and in their fidelity some of them shamed even the chosen apostles. From Pentecost onward the story of the growing church is set with names of women, the jewels in the crown of light. Lydia is one of these godly women, whose quick response to the message of the risen Saviour gave entrance for the Word into the whole community. The work in Macedonia radiated from Lydia's house.

Throughout the centuries, the life of the church has found its most permanent influence in the faith and devotion of women. Men preached; women performed. Their voices were not heard, but their deeds spoke for Christ. The great Protestant missionary movements, in the early days of the nineteenth century, were at first largely masculine. The first missionaries, though married, did not take their wives as fellow evangelists, but as helpmates. Gradually the work of these helpmates made it evident that the shortest way to the heart of the heathen lay through the loving cooperation of the women. Especially in the Orient, the native customs denied men missionaries any opportunity to preach except to men. Something over two generations ago foreign missionary work by women for women was started. The Methodist women organized in 1869, the Presbyterian in 1870, and the Baptist in 1871. Women physicians as directors of hospitals and as family physicians carried the message of healing and the message of salvation; if not in the same medicine chest at least in the same heart. The home life was blessed where Christ had entered women's hearts, and the men who could not be convinced by the missionary's argument, have come seeking the power which has transformed their wives. The whole story of the misery and slavery from which Christian missions are saving the women of Eastern nations is too long for the space available for this little article, but if the leader of this meeting will write to the Baptist Women's Board of Foreign Missions, Ford Building, Boston, Mass., it is probable that much enlightening material may be secured regarding the missionary work of women.

Lessons from Beautiful Proverbs

Christian Endeavor Topic. Prov. 10:1-16

IN the process of gaining wisdom Solomon tasted both wisdom and folly. We can, therefore, safely take his word, and save ourselves much costly experience. The Proverbs are condensed nuggets of proven wisdom. It would be well to ask some individual to discuss each verse of the lesson, limiting them to two minutes to each verse, for each stands more or less alone, and each has its own particular lesson.

The whole lesson is a study in contrasts. "A wise son maketh a glad father, but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother." "The wise in heart will receive the commandments, but a prating fool shall fall." "In the life of him that hath understanding wisdom is found, but a rod is for the back of him that is void of understanding." Thus the verses progress, setting off the light of God's mercy, with the shadow of his just displeasure. The Proverbs have one outstanding value, and that is, to teach wisdom. To recognize their beauty, to accept their truth, to admit their fitness, and then to follow the path of disobedience, is a folly sure to lead to spiritual disaster. The principal value of the Proverbs lies in taking home to our own hearts all the lessons which they teach so clearly, and each is just as true today as it was when Solomon, surfeited with folly, disgusted with sin, set them down to warn others from the thorny path that he had followed.

Is Christ First in My Life?

Epworth League Topic. Matt. 6:33; Phil. 2:19-22; 3:7, 8

IT has been freely charged that one reason for the weakness in evangelism of the modern church lies in the fact that more than half of its members have never been converted, but have entered the church on the basis of a purely mental faith, their hearts never having been stirred to their depths by the Spirit of God. But many who have been converted have not progressed from the penitent's bench to the altar of complete consecration. Religion and the Saviour are still incidents in a busy life which they do not dominate. Such a life may be strong in many ways, may even be productive of some good; yet it will fall short of the complete realization of the Christian ideal. If the church is to win the world for Christ, it can only do it when the members put Christ first. When personal advantage, or the regard of friends, or the pleasures of this world, or even the cares of crowded days, push Christ in the background, the life is weakened and without force for righteousness. Paul said that all things that were gain to him he counted loss for Christ. Whatever he might have done as a Jewish Pharisee, he would have lost all that he gained as a Christian. From a little known student of Gamaliel he became the great apostle to the Gentiles. That is what Christ can do with a life that is all his. How may you know what Christ can do with your life? Give it to him first. Can you do less?

Uncle Sam Cannot Afford to Lose ONE SINGLE LIFE

Our Country Needs Every Man, Woman and Child

WATER vitally affects your health and the value of your property. If it is not pure it causes many apparently unaccountable troubles.

It is to aid you in guarding against the evils of impure water, to preserve the health of your family, that we say to you—GET THESE BOOKS. REMEMBER—They are FREE. Don't say—"If I had only known." FIND OUT! There is no room for ignorance in this modern world. The man who doesn't know, loses out. It's your fault if you fail to post yourself about things which vitally concern you. Your government employs hosts of wise men to study your problems.

PEOPLE ARE THE COUNTRY'S MOST VALUABLE ASSET

Each year thousands of people waste their lives and those of their loved ones through typhoid fever and allied diseases. People are the country's most valuable asset and simple precaution can prevent their untimely death.

THIS GREAT PUBLIC MENACE MUST BE PUBLICLY DISCUSSED

An impolite subject, politely brought to your attention.

The United States Public Health Service has provided these simple and concise books on the care and protection of your water supply. Every householder in the country, rural district or small town, where the purity of the water is an individual responsibility, can profit by these books.

Does your privy, stable or hog pen pollute your water supply or that of your neighbors? You may think that it does not, when in reality it is a spot of contamination for a large area.

SAVE MANY DOLLARS

Simple methods of prevention will save you many dollars in doctors' bills and long weary, dragging illness and possible death.

YOU ARE TO BLAME

If your children die of typhoid or malarial diseases—YOU ARE TO BLAME. If you are made inefficient through the ravages of these diseases, YOU ARE TO BLAME.

Nothing but your own care can overcome these dangers. LOOK TO YOUR WATER SUPPLY. BE SURE THAT IT IS PURE. THESE FREE BOOKS WILL TELL YOU HOW, and we want every reader of the CHRISTIAN HERALD to send for them—Be sure to write your name and address plainly.

A STEADY stream of contributions to the Soldiers and Sailors Fund is making possible the sending of Christian Herald to hundreds of Soldier Boys. Most of them go to the Chaplains, to the First Sergeant of companies, and to Y. M. C. A. huts. A chaplain in a camp in South Carolina, wrote, early in June: "At this time we are using many magazines here among the soldiers. The demand is great, and we would appreciate and could use several copies of the Christian Herald." Ten subscriptions were entered for this chaplain. Another chaplain in Texas, wrote: "The interest that I have for the Christian Herald grows as each issue proves itself to me more valuable. Realizing its value, and the worth it has to those who read it, I am very anxious that it get into the hands of as many men as possible in my regiment." Thirty subscriptions were entered for this chaplain. And so it goes. Day by day, your money is making possible the fulfilling of these requests which reach us constantly. We have not yet had to refuse a single request, and we know that you good people of the Christian Herald Family will see that all are met.

Why Live An Inferior Life?

I know that I can easily, quickly and positively prove to you that you are only half as alive as you must be to realize the joys and benefits of living in full; and that you are only half as well as you should be, half as vigorous as you can be, half as ambitious as you may be, and only half as well developed as you ought to be.

THE fact is that no matter who you are, whether you are young or old, weak or strong, rich or poor, I can prove to you readily by demonstration that you are leading an inferior life, and I want the opportunity to show you the way in which you may completely and easily, without inconvenience or loss of time, come into possession of new life, vigor, energy, development and a higher realization of life and success.

Become Superior to Others

The Swoboda System can make a better human being of you physically, mentally and in every way. The Swoboda System can do more for you than you can imagine. It can so vitalize every organ, tissue and cell of your body as to make the mere act of living a joy. It can give you an intense, thrilling and pulsating nature. It can increase your very life. I not only promise it, I guarantee it. My guarantee is unusual, startling, specific, positive and absolutely fraud-proof.

Why Take Less Than Your Full Share of Life and Pleasure?

Are you living a full and successful life? Why not always be at your best—thoroughly well, virile, energetic? Why not invest in yourself and make the most of your every opportunity? It is easy when you know how. The Swoboda System points the way. It requires no drugs, no appliances, no dieting, no study, no loss of time, no special bathing; there is nothing to worry you. It gives ideal mental and physical conditions without inconvenience or trouble.

Your Earning Power,

your success, depend entirely upon your energy, health, vitality, memory and will power. Without these, all knowledge becomes of small value, for it cannot be put into active use. The Swoboda System can make you tireless, improve your memory, intensify your will power, and make you physically just as you ought to be.

These New Copyrighted Books Are Free

"CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION" and "THE SCIENCE OF LIFE" will show you how you can increase the pleasures of life to a maximum how to intensify them and how to make your life more profitable, pleasurable and joyous. These essays will show you the way to the full life, the superior life, the more satisfactory life, the lively life. They will show you how to overcome the inferior life, the feeble life, the negative life, the unsatisfactory life.

"CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION" and "THE SCIENCE OF LIFE" are the A B C of Evolution and persistent youth. These books explain Conscious Evolution and the human body as it never has been explained before. They explain the Swoboda theory, the law and the reason for the evolution of mind and body.

They tell how the cells and their energies build the organs and the body, and how to organize the cells beyond the point where Nature left off for you, and where you, as Nature, may continue your self-evolution.

These books will give you a better understanding of yourself than you could obtain through reading all of the books on all of the sciences and philosophies on the subject of mind and body.

Why Miss the Super-Pleasures of Life?

"CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION" and "THE SCIENCE OF LIFE," will show you how to increase your pleasures and happiness to a maximum, and how to reduce your troubles of every character, mental, physical and physiological to a minimum.

Conscious Evolution will show you how to intensify, prolong, increase and magnify your pleasures.

"CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION" and "THE SCIENCE OF LIFE" will show you that you have not as yet experienced the real and highest pleasures of life, and will show you how to attain the super-pleasures of life. In a word, these two essays will reveal the startling, educating and enlightening secret of gigantic health and mind power.

"CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION" and "THE SCIENCE OF LIFE," which Swoboda has written and copyrighted, will be sent you free of charge and free of all obligation to Swoboda, if you will write for them.

What Others Have to Say:

"Worth more than a thousand dollars to me in increased mental and physical capacity."

"I was very skeptical, now am pleased with results; have gained 17 pounds."

"The very first lesson began to work magic. In my gratitude, I am telling my croaking and complaining friends, 'Try Swoboda.'"

"Words cannot explain the new life it imparts to both body and brain."

"It reduced my weight 29 pounds, increased my chest expansion 5 inches, reduced my waist 6 inches."

"My reserve force makes me feel that nothing is impossible, my capacity both physically and mentally is increasing daily."

"I think your system is wonderful. I thought I was in the best of physical health before I wrote for your course, but I can now note the greatest improvement even in this short time. I cannot recommend your system too highly. Do not hesitate to refer to me."

"You know more about the human body than any man with whom I have ever come in contact personally or otherwise."

The Grub Question in the Camps

What a Visit to Army, Navy and Aviation Mess Tables and Kitchens Disclosed

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

I HAVE just returned from a tour of several of the army, navy and aviation camps and I discover on inspecting my notes that there are in those few camps, nineteen "best mess in the service" feeding halls. The monotonous chant or praise might have been tiresome had it not been for the smiles and heartiness and good-fellowship of the khaki and duck-elad fighting men who invariably answered to my question, "How's the grub?" with the reply that the grub was "bully," "out of sight," "best yet," and other commendatory phrases too numerous to mention.

I never let a mess sergeant speak when I could talk to an underfed stripling, whose whole heart was set on eating his way into the army; and I never let a doctor of dietetics lecture me when I could pick up the top of a mess table and see whether there was dirt between the boards. I looked into the cold storage branches where the meat is kept, and into the garbage cans. I talked to Y. M. C. A. men—those confidants of homesick men with a petty grievance—and to the mothers who brought over some cookies in the belief that Sammie was not getting home cooking. And the whole thing was a happy, cheery concord of praise and thanksgiving.

As a member of the Michigan National Guard, I have eaten army rations, I have eaten with the Japanese army on maneuvers, chop-sticked my way through the same food the Chinese soldiers are served, dined on black bread and lentils with the Russian army, and been on the army ration of the Czecho-Slovaks for weeks on end. I have lived in the top-notch hotels and have done cross-country "hikes" in China on a liquid diet. I feel qualified to say, not that our army is the best-fed army in the world—for there are some armies of whose rations I know nothing—but that our army is fed as well as any man in any station of life has a right to be fed, and much more carefully and hygienically than most of us poor civilians.

THE U. S. Steamship Great Lakes is the biggest ship I was ever on, and though she has not yet been launched, there are thirty-six thousand men on her and she is already in commission. When a seaman or yeoman or ensign goes to Chicago from Great Lakes Training Station, he calls it a "trip ashore." The hallways in the buildings are "decks" and the kitchens are "galleys." Even the civilian has to enter into the game, for if he leaves the path and walks on the grass, he is likely to find himself overboard very quickly.

How would you, mother of men, like to cook a meal or provide utensils for four huskies and then have twenty-six others drop in as extras? "Packey" Schwartz, the chief cook and battle hasher of the "Great Lakes," had that problem, only it was twenty-six hundred and four hundred instead of just four. "Packey" answered, "Nothing is impossible! There is no word 'Can't' in the navy dictionary and the soldiers have even taken the cant out of Cantigny."

At "Packey's" table, I was a "sea politician." A sea politician is a man whose prowess as a baseball player or an oarsman secures for him better food than the average sailor gets. That is why I had delicious coffee with thick cream, and cream pie with the flakiest of crusts, rather than the ordinary food. But the ordinary food is 9. =, which means O. K. if you press the Capital shift on the Corona, instead of the Figure shift as I did then.

The crew's menu for the day I was at Great Lakes read:

Breakfast—baked hash, catsup, coffee cake, fresh fruit, B. B. C.

Dinner—corned beef, cabbage, boiled potatoes, green onions, bean soup, croutons, B. C.

Supper—fried lunch meat, creamed potatoes, lettuce salad, bananas, B. B. T.

And that was just what the common sailors-to-be were getting.

IN these days when meatless, wheatless, eatless days are scattered through the calendar as thickly as Russian church holidays, and a baked potato costs a quarter, where will you find the hotel that abbreviates "Bread, Butter, Coffee" to "B. B. C."? It must peeve an enlisted man to have to eat in a diner with captains of industry, corporation lawyers and such folk, and have to pay big prices for poorer food and less of it than he gets for nothing while in camp. I haven't eaten beef except in private homes since returning from Russia. I don't eat wheat bread in public places either. But at the camps, I ate tender beef and the whitest of bread.

When I told a very rich society matron that my conscience would not let me eat beef and wheat in these days, when our fighting men are giving their all for us, she replied, "As long as the breweries are using up tons of grain, carloads of ice and train-loads of coal, I shall feel no compunction about eating wheat products." But the soldiers and sailors of Uncle Sam can eat all the wheat bread and fresh beef they want. "Eat all you want, but clean your plate," is the only rule for our men in khaki.

"Packey" Schwartz is an enthusiast and his job is to feed up the new recruits. If any are under weight, they are put in his care. One patriotic lad had picked up two pounds a week for six weeks, thus eating his way into a chance to fight for "Old Glory" and the things worth while that the grand old flag stands for. "Packey, the underwear stretcher," they call him, and the rumor goes that "Packey" took Raymond Hitchcock into his mess for a day, and when the lean comedian went back to Chicago after entertaining the lads, and being entertained by "Packey," his company took him for Fatty Arbuckle. Apoplexy is the only disease "Packey's" epicureans fear, and the drill-masters have a sure cure for that.

Camp Custer in Michigan is a big camp. I found out there that food simply cannot enter the camp in bad condition. Health and not profit is the demand that is placed upon the cooks and mess-sergeants, and if they were to serve anything bad, the fault would be theirs.

Meeting an old acquaintance who is now a Y. M. C. A. worker at Camp Custer, I asked him about the food. "I have eaten at more than a dozen messes," he replied, "and the food is fine in all of them. The men know it and like everything they get. The only men who grumble are those who never had good food, and hence don't know that gustatory delights have their limit and that ambrosia and nectar don't make a fighting ration."

I COULD write a book on the things I saw at the camps; but about 'steen hundred other men have done this, and I must go on to Fort Wayne and Detroit, where the color of the soldiers modifies their religion or determines it and makes fishless days on Friday possible. "Colored Catholics," I was told, "are as rare as casualties among the Kaiser's sons, and so we don't have to serve fish on Friday to these Methodist and Baptist troops. We saved five hundred dollars on our food allowances for every hundred men last month and that made it possible to give them ice cream, new potatoes and other delicacies, and still keep inside our allowance. The men appreciate it."

I asked a lot of the colored troops how they liked the grub and they put on smiles that were as large as any Jolson, Tinney or Fields ever wore, and much more genuine. The Bolsheviks would give the Grand Prize to Fort Wayne, for there the common soldier has better food than the officers. Uncle Sam feeds the soldier. A boarding-house keeper feeds the officers and charges them $10 a week for it. You can imagine how long it will be before the German soldier gets better food than the Crown Prince, and lets officers take second best as in the case at Fort Wayne.

The day before I visited Wilbur Wright Field, near Dayton, there were two fine showers and when I reached the big flying field, the sky and clouds had that hand-washed look that reminds one of poetry and sulphur and molasses and love, and a lot more of that pre-war stuff. This blue-and-white sky was potted here and there with buzzing bugs of giant proportions and the roads were dotted with M. P.'s whose duty was to keep trespassers away. But the commanding officer was glad to have me see the kitchens and mess-halls and ice boxes and men, and gave me a highly intelligent Nutrition Expert from the Food Division of the Sanitary Corps as guide. In the Nutritional Survey there is not only a close inspection but instruction in how to improve the diet and abolish the waste. You and I can die by a score of diseases which it is the duty of these experts to prevent among the enlisted men.

The only safe attitude of mind, while inspecting the food conditions at the camps, is that the best is none too good for the men who are to do the fighting. Otherwise most of us would become jealous of the soldier. I know something about food conditions in Armenia, Russia and Siberia and have read about conditions in France, England and Italy and I say in all seriousness that no ordinary civilian has any right to eat better than the soldiers in our camps eat, and no civilian can command such close and intelligent inspection of his diet as is provided for U. S. army food.

New potatoes, new onions and new cabbage hearts were among the foods that were provided at Wilbur Wright Field, but the best mess hall, the best mess and the most varied food I saw anywhere was at McCook Experimental Field at Dayton, where exhaustive tests are being carried out with every type of machine that flies. Officers tell me that the mess at McCook's is the best in the United States, which means in the world; but as I said before, eighteen other messes make the same claim.

Lieutenant Valentine is giving thought to his problem. He is not content to feed his men better than any others in the service, but he does it for a cent a day less than any other camp he knows, and tries to save such foods as are needed abroad.

There is no quartermaster at McCook Field and the food is bought in the open market. Vegetables and milk are scarce at Dayton; but the men get the best mess I know of, at a cost of 46 cents a day. Deliveries are made by a truck belonging to the army and the food is bought at wholesale; but look over this bill of fare and see whether you could feed hungry men this kind of food on 46 cents a day.

Breakfast—Peaches, oatmeal, corn bread and butter, fresh milk, coffee.

Dinner—Roast lamb, mint sauce, new cabbage, green peas, new potatoes, bread and butter, peach short cake, iced tea.

Supper—Pork sausage grilled, American fried potatoes, apple pie, bread and butter, cocoa.

The men have butter at every meal and fresh milk every morning (though it costs 35 cents a gallon) because savings are made in other ways. The sale of soup bones alone amounted to $11 in one month.

When I saw pink-frosted cake and the finest of Rocky Ford melons in the mess hall of common aviators, I marveled.

But it is care and not extravagance that explains their presence there. That and enthusiasm. I did not get the name of the mess-sergeant but he is a man with his heart in the work. He helped open Nat Goodwin's place in Frisco and worked for eight years in the smoking department of Cudahy at Los Angeles. That is the sort of men who are feeding "our boys."

No meat is served on Monday, hence none is carried over Sunday. There was not an ounce of meat in the ice-box when I was there; but as I was leaving, I saw two fine legs of beef come in on the truck.

UNCLE SAM says "fresh meat" and means it. The trained chefs would prefer to let the meat hang a while and say that makes it taste better; but Uncle Sam is not catering to epicurean palates as much as to husky warriors, and he says "fresh."

The mess hall at McCook's is white enameled and thoroughly screened. It is steam-heated and the floor is as clean as a table. The plain wood tables have a removable center board and every crack is clean. Minstrel shows and boxing exhibitions have made it possible to buy crockery in place of enamel ware, and the mess is the aristocratic club of the service. Officers and men eat in the same hall but at different tables, so that there is perfect freedom.

Lieutenant Valentine's observation of meatless days and wheatless days is thoroughly commendable, while his ability to buy in the open market and serve the best mess for a cent a day less than quartermaster-supplied messes, is worthy of notice.

McCook Field is the home of enthusiasts and experts. The same squadron has been there for months, and conditions can be better than in the great cantonments where constant changes are made. The mess at McCook is a challenge to the intelligence not only of other army mess officers, but also of the housewives of the nation.

The food reaches the camps in A1 shape, after being government inspected. The restaurants where the soldiers eat while away from camp are also closely inspected. The men like the food. Don't worry! All is well in the army kitchens. The only taint about the report of tainted food is that 'tain't so.

Mitchel Buried With Full Honors

Major John Purroy Mitchel

Board of Aldermen. Before he turned the city over to his successor he had purged it of gang rule, and gambling and vice, no longer productive, were being hunted from one location to another. The city's streets were clean, its government was clean, and Mr. Mitchel was rightly given much of the credit.

PAST the body that was his, as it lay in state at the foot of the stairs his feet had so often mounted, while two soldiers of the Regular Army stood on either side with bayonets fixed, there filed through long hours a steady stream of men and women who wished to pay honor to this honorable man. Some dropped flowers, others only a tear upon the flag-draped casket on which lay the dead officer's cap. In the over the way. As the solemn notes of the bells rang out eight sergeants of the 22d Infantry acting as body bearers, took up the coffin and carried it down the steps to a waiting artillery caisson. As they appeared in the door the thousands of people massed about the City Hall uncovered, the soldiers and sailors of the military guard came to present arms, and the police saluted with their batons, while the police glee club sang "He, who is Upright." Behind the caisson stood a horse, covered with a black pall, saddled and bridled with an empty scabbard and empty boots hanging from the saddle.

THE procession started promptly, the band playing Handel's great Dead March from Saul, that funeral march whose human sorrow is shot through with triumphant faith. Overhead six airplanes circled dropping flowers in the line of march. Between 5,000 and 6,000 persons took part in the funeral procession, including representatives of the Army and Navy, the New York State Guard, the police and firemen, the New York State and city governments and many civic organizations. The honorary pall bearers were: Theodore Roosevelt, Colonel E. M. House, G. W. Wickersham, Frank L. Polk, Admiral N. R. Usher, Captain G. von L. Meyer, Jr., John G. Agar, Cleveland H. Dodge, Dr. N. M. Butler, George W. Perkins, Jacob H. Schiff, General William A. Mann and Lient. Col. A. Woods. Gov. Whitman of New York State and his staff, followed the 814th Aero Squadron, Major Mitchel's first command. At one time as the parade marched up Fifth Avenue three bands were playing at one time the Chopin Funeral March, but during most of the course the march was accompanied only by the tap of muffled drums.

SHORTLY before 11 o'clock the head of the procession reached St. Patrick's Cathedral, the chimes were playing hymns of Christian faith, ceasing at 11.30, when the body was removed from the caisson, carried into the church and placed before the chancel, while the choir sang the music of the Choral Mass by Galloti, rendered for the first time in this country. The religious ceremony of the mass was not extended by any sermon or eulogy, Major Mitchel's family having requested that these be omitted.

As the last sentences of the ritual fell from the lips of the officiating priest, the body bearers took up the coffin and carried it slowly down the aisle, while the organ played "The Star Spangled Banner." As they reached the door the police choir sang "Nearer My God to Thee," while the military escort stood at salute as the coffin was placed in the hearse.

AT Woodlawn Cemetery, where the body was interred, some 5,000 persons had gathered. As the prayers for the dead were said two airplanes dropped American beauty roses in showers upon the funeral party. The prayers for the dead being finished three volleys were fired over the grave by Infantrymen from Governor's Island, taps sounded and the mourners drove away, while airplanes overhead still continued to drop roses.

Major Mitchel's mother said to a friend on the way to the cemetery: "I am glad that John took up his fight for preparedness. I am glad that he had the courage to fight against those who opposed him in it. I am proud that he had the courage to go into the most dangerous branch of the service. I know that he died bravely, and as his mother I must try to live that way."

THE official investigation of the accident which cost Major Mitchel his life and the nation a brilliant officer, disclosed no evidence of any defect in the airplane. It was established that the Major had failed to attach his safety straps and his fall was laid to the failure to take this precaution.

Major Mitchel's last entrance into City Hall

THE body of John Purroy Mitchel reached New York on July 9, and was taken to his mother's home, where it rested on the afternoon of the 10th, when it was accompanied by a military escort to the historic City Hall. There it lay in state until the morning of the 11th. The Mayor of New York City is inevitably a national character. If he is a tool of a great political organization the country knows it; if he is clean and his own man the country knows it also and honors him, and it honored Mayor Mitchel. Mr. Mitchel's remarkably constructive record in New York's municipal government had made him known from Maine to Oregon, and messages of sympathy poured in upon his wife and mother from every corner of the country. Mr. Mitchel was recognized throughout the nation as a champion of honest, efficient, public government. He hated the crook and the pilfering public contractor. In his four years as Mayor he completed the work he began as President of the line were members of the present and former state governments, associates of Mr. Mitchel in the government of the city and in the practice of law; policemen, firemen, city employees and thousands of those unknown people whose votes make governments, and whose faith sustains patriots.

JUST after 9 o'clock on the morning of July 11 the bell in the tower of New York City Hall began to toll at 30-second intervals, being answered by the bell in St. Paul's Chapel

Americans Throw Back Great German Offensive

FOR a month, since the stopping on June 15 of the German attack on Campiagne, the Allied armies had been awaiting the next blow of Germany's war machine. It was expected that it would be made either toward the sea—a last desperate effort to destroy the British army and to secure new submarine bases on the channel—or toward Chalons in the Champagne, a move, which if successful, might take Rheims and Verdun and set the Allied lines back to a line from Chateau-Thierry to St. Mihiel. The long delay, a full month, in the launching of the new offensive, was variously explained as due to influenza, broken morale and quarrels between the Kaiser and von Hindenburg, the latter being reported as dead of apoplexy, following a tilt with the "war lord." German army orders captured early in July place the opening of the offensive between July 6 and 13. During those days it rained, but the blow came with clearer skies on July 15.

At midnight of July 14, as France was just completing her celebration of the birth of liberty, the German guns began their newest challenge to the spirit of Democracy. The sound of the guns was heard in Paris, and the flash was seen from Montmartre. The Allied line was heavily shelled with high explosives and gas, from Vaux west of Chateau-Thierry, along the Marne to Dormans, northeast to Rheims and east across the Champagne country to the Main de Massiges, just west of the Argonne, a total distance of over 56½ miles. Great German naval guns shelled the towns in the rear of the Allies as far as 25 miles back of the lines, and this explained the delay in the offensive, for these guns require time for bringing them forward and preparing the emplacements. The long-distance bombardment of Paris was also resumed, after a lapse of three weeks.

With dawn of the 15th came the infantry attacks, but this had been anticipated; in fact General Foch had foreseen the whole manoeuvre, and Allied guns began their counter-bombardment an hour ahead of the Germans'. Two battalions attacked the Americans at Vaux. Retiring behind the railway west of the town, they received the enemy waves with concentrated rifle and machine gun fire. When the shattered German infantry wavered, the Americans counter-attacked and threw the Germans back some 750 yards, taking and holding former German positions and some prisoners.

East of Chateau-Thierry, the Germans attempted to cross the Marne at various places between that town and Dormans. After severe losses, under the accurate fire of French and American artillery and machine guns, the Germans succeeded in throwing across the Marne half a dozen bridges in the vicinity of Jaulgonne at the apex of the northern curve of the river, between Passy and Fossoy. They also crossed east of Dormans. Across these bridges, two of which were soon smashed by Allied artillery, the Huns swept the southern side, and began fighting their way back from the river. American machine gun units fought them to a standstill, until the guns were too hot to fire, and the American-French lines were finally withdrawn to the base of the curve of the river.

By noon of the 15th there were 15,000 to 20,000 Germans in the bend of the river and the battle was developing for Fossoy. But this was America's day. In a magnificent counter-attack, the American troops completely overwhelmed the German divisions south of the Marne, driving them back in disorder with terrible loss, until by nightfall the only Germans south of the stream were some 1500 or more, including an entire Brigade staff, who had been taken prisoners. The French also drove the Germans back, practically clearing the southern bank of the stream.

Between Dormans and Rheims, the Germans appeared to have advanced some 2½ to 3 miles on a front of a little over 20 miles, where they were halted on the line of Chatillon-sur-Marne, Cuchery, Marfaux and Bouilly. East of Rheims, although employing tanks, the Hun was stopped in his tracks.

At eleven P. M. on July 15, General Foch declared himself well satisfied with the day's fighting, and he sent to General Pershing a telegram congratulating him and the American army in their splendid victory.

The drive was not renewed on July 16, although it developed that some 30 to 35 divisions had been massed for the attack. The greatest penetration anywhere from Rheims to Dormans was less than 4 miles.

The Bastille Day celebration in New York City at the statue of Joan of Arc

THE resolution passed by the House on July 9, and by the Senate, on July 12, sending the fraternal greetings of the Congress and the American people to the people and Government of France, and calling on the people of America to fittingly observe July 14th, found the nation already deep in preparations for a fitting recognition of the day from which dates French liberty. Throughout the nation French and American flags greeted the sunrise of July 14th and the strains of Marseillaise were heard from coast to coast. In New York, at Madison Square Garden, in a Great Mass Meeting 12,000 persons gave tribute to France, pronounced by Ignace Paderevski, "invincible, triumphant and immortal," while the people rose and cheered. Other celebrations were held in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, and at the Joan of Arc Statue, at Riverside Drive and 93d Street.

A Week in the World's News

PRESIDENT MAY TAKE WIRES.

The Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce to which the House resolution authorizing the President to take over the wire communications of the country for the period of the war was referred, reported the bill to the Senate on July 9 without recommendation.

After two days of debate the Senate, voting 46 to 16, passed the resolution. The resolution gives the President authority to take over and operate all telegraph, telephone, radio and cable systems in the country. While this authority includes the power to restrict the use of the wires, Congress was assured that no attempt would be made to abridge or censor the news dispatches upon which the public must depend for its knowledge of current events.

PRESIDENT USES VETO. President Wilson, on July 11, vetoed the joint resolution of Congress, extending the time in which the Railroad Administration might relinquish the control of the lines not wanted in the Federal system. The President vetoed it because it would have forced the Government to retain control of roads having no national importance. The President, also, on July 12, vetoed the Department of Agriculture Appropriation bill because it contained a provision fixing the minimum price of wheat at $2.40. The House had placed it at $2.20, as fixed by the Food Administration and by executive order. The standard price of $2.20 was held to be sufficient to stimulate production and the President paid tribute to the loyalty of the farmers who were exerting themselves to an extraordinary degree to produce the largest and best crops possible.

PROHIBITION IN THE SENATE. On July 8 Senator Gore of Oklahoma introduced an amendment to the Emergency Food Act, under discussion in the Senate, under which the selling of whisky would be prohibited after December 31, 1918, and the selling of beer after the same date, although no beer could be manufactured after November 1st. The inclusion of this amendment in the Act was resisted by Senator Penrose of Pennsylvania as a breach of the Senate rules. Senator Saulsbury, president pro tempore, sustained the point of order raised by Penrose. The Senate, however, voted to overrule the chair, retaining the amendment in the bill by a vote of 36 to 33. On July 13, the Senate and House agreed to recess until August 24. Prohibition will be taken up when the Senate reconvenes and will remain the order of business until the final vote is taken. The dries were confident of a favorable vote.

TO TAX OURSELVES FOR VICTORY. A great many reports have come from the capital regarding the details of the great Revenue Bill which is to turn $8,000,000,000 from the pockets of the citizens into those of Uncle Sam. It was suggested, on July 7, that luxuries would be heavily taxed. It was announced that the Committee hoped to obtain about $5,000,000,000 from War profits and at least $2,000,000,000 from incomes. On July 9th, following the receipt of a memorandum from the treasury, a more detailed list of the proposed taxes was made public. It was proposed to place a tax of 50 per cent. on the retail price of jewelry, watches and clocks; 25 per cent. on automobiles, motorcycles, bicycles, musical instruments and allied lines, with a tax, rate not specified, on men's suits, selling for more than $30, and on women's suits, selling for more than $40, and a similar tax on hats, shirts, pajamas, hosiery, shoes, gloves, underwear, neckwear, readymade dresses, skirts, lingerie, corsets, dress goods, children's clothing, house furnishings, table linen, cutlery, silverware, china and cut glass, curtains, tapestries, purses, pocket-books, hand bags and toilet articles. All hotel bills of more than $2.50 per person per day were to be taxed 10 per cent.

and cabaret and restaurant bills at the same rate. A tax of 10 cents a gallon on gasoline was proposed. Taxes now levied on soft drinks were to be multiplied by four. Chewing gum was to pay a tax of one cent on each five-cent package. Motion picture shows and films were to be more heavily taxed. Taxes on alcoholic beverages and distilled spirits were to be doubled, and an automobile tax of from $15 to $50 per car, depending on horsepower, was suggested. Taxes on club dues, now 10 per cent., were to be doubled, and taxes were to be levied against families employing servants in excess of one female servant. At this writing no word had come from the Committee as to proposed changes in the postal tax. There was suggested consumption taxes on tea coffee, cocoa and sugar.

$30,000,000 FOR A POISONED PRESS. The arrest on July 8 of Dr. Edward A. Rumely, ostensible proprietor of the New York Evening Mail, brought to a focus rumors of German influence in American newspaper offices, which had been more or less persistent for over two years. Dr. Rumely purchased the Mail about June 1, 1915. In connection with the arrest, the fact was made public that the funds for the purchase had been furnished by the Imperial German Government from monies realized by the sale of German Government bonds in America. (The names of the purchasers of these bonds are in the possession of the Government.) In connection with the arrest, it was announced that a sum of $30,000,000 had been spent by Dr. Bernard Dernburg, Dr. Heinrich Albert and former Ambassador Von Bernstoff, in an effort to create public opinion in America favorable to Germany. Later evidence indicated that the total expended might have been $100,000,000. Sen. King of Utah, on July 11, introduced into the Senate a resolution proposing a searching investigation of the methods employed to control American public opinion. The German propaganda activities centered about the New York office of the German Red Cross Society.

A NEW GOVERNMENT IN SIBERIA. Dispatches from Peking, on July 10, reported that a new provisional Siberian government had been established at Novonikolayevsk under Gen. Horvath and had declared itself bound by Russia's treaties of alliance with the Entente. The defeat of the Bolsheviks in western Siberia was also confirmed. In connection with the establishment of this government it was announced that a counterrevolution, assisted by the Czechoslovaks was spreading all over western Siberia, and that a movement was on foot among the Allies to induce the Czechoslovak forces in Siberia to remain as a nucleus to the Allied army which is to support the reconstituted Russia. In the meantime the United States and the Allies were reported as discussing the personnel of the commission which is to be sent to Russia to assist in its political and economic rebirth. The assassination of Count von Mirbach at Moscow proved to be a part of an organized attempt at revolution, which was, however, suppressed by the Bolshevik Red Guards, after two days of bitter fighting in the streets. On July 11 the German government was reported as transporting large numbers of troops to the Ukraine on account of a revolution of Ukrainian peasants against the government which Germany had set up in Kiev. The peasants were reported to be well armed and to be entrenching themselves. On July 11, the Bolsheviks claimed to have defeated the Czechoslovak troops west of the Volga. They also announced an offensive of the Red Guard in western Siberia, before which the Czechs were said to be retreating. It was announced, on July 13, that Great Britain was sending military expeditions to Archangel and to Vladivostok, the reports intimating that troops were going in sufficient numbers to be effective.

HERTLING CONTINUES PEACE DRIVE. Suggested on the day following his now famous speech, the resignation of Dr. von Kühlmann, German foreign secretary, was officially reported on July 9 as having been accepted by the Emperor. It was reported that Admiral von Hintze, reported a master of intrigue and an ardent Pan-German, had been selected to succeed the Foreign secretary who dared to believe victory impossible. Notwithstanding the resignation of von Kühlmann, and the contemplated appointment of a violent Pan-German to his place, the peace drive forecast by Kühlmann's admission that victory was not to be expected by force of arms was fathered in a debate upon the general situation by Imperial Chancellor von Hertling in the Reichstag, on July 12. The Chancellor declared that he was still inspired by the pacific spirit of the Imperial reply to the peace note of Pope Benedict. He declared, however, that "President Wilson wants war until we are destroyed, and what Mr. Balfour, the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has said must really drive the flush of anger to the cheeks of every German. . . . As long as the desire for our destruction exists we must hold out, and we will hold out. . . . In the direction of our policy nothing will be changed. . . . If in spite of these hostile statements any serious efforts for a paving of the way to peace were to show themselves anywhere we would examine these seriously-meant efforts immediately with scrupulous care. . . . When such possibilities manifest themselves, and when serious inclinations toward peace show themselves on the other side, we will immediately go into them; that is to say, we will not reject them and we will speak, to begin, within a small circle. . . . Exhaustive discussions took place regarding these questions July 1st and 2nd at general headquarters under the presidency of the had indicated possible further action. On July 6 the Italian and French troops, holding the line eastward from Avlona along the southern road to Monastir, took the offensive against the Austrian troops in the Albanian mountains, the troops advancing along the coast were assisted by British monitors and Italian destroyers. The Allied troops advanced in seven columns along the valleys of the Volusa, the Semeni, the Osum and the Temorica Rivers. Important heights fell into Allied hands on the first day, and the progress was constant until the 10th, when the Allied troops, having taken Fieri, and crossed the Semeni, threatened the central Albanian town of Berat, while the Austrians were rapidly withdrawing toward the old Roman high road from Durazzo to Monastir, along the valley of the Skumbi. On the 11th the Austrians were reported as completely routed and on the 12th Berat was in Allied hands and French forces

Somme to a depth of 300 yards along a total front of 3000 yards. The French on July 9, attacking between Montdidier and the River Oise, advanced their positions along a two-and-a-half-mile front to a depth of more than a mile at some points, capturing a village, two fortified farms and 450 prisoners. The British on July 14 captured 260 Germans in a local advance east of Dickebusch Lake, south of Ypres.

French troops, on July 12, took from the Germans the major portion of their positions in Picardy west of the Avre. The attack was along a front of about four miles from north of Castel nearly to Mailly-Raineval, the latter village being about six miles north of Cantigny. The French penetrated to a depth of two kilometers, took 500 prisoners, the village of Castel and a number of strongly fortified enemy positions.

The actions of the last two weeks, between the Aisne and the Villers-Cotterêts forest, have accounted for over 10,000 prisoners, and have placed the French advanced positions on commanding heights along the whole front, giving the French every advantage of position should the Germans decide to attack again in this region.

The British in the year ending June 30, 1918, brought down on all fronts 4,102 Teuton airplanes, losing 1121 themselves.

Gen. Pershing, on July 11, pinned the War Cross on 37 marines who had distinguished themselves in the fighting at Belleau Wood. On the same day he issued an order declaring France's festival day, July 14, a holiday for all troops of the American Expeditionary forces not actually engaged with the enemy. Gen. Pershing reported also that American and Allied artillery was now liberally supplied with mustard gas shells which were used with good effect upon a concentration of German troops west of Chateau-Thierry and north of the Marne, which was entirely broken up. Patrols discovered on the next morning that the Germans had been fully prepared with pontoons and materials for the crossing of the river. Berlin on July 11 claimed to have shot down six American aviators who were attempting to raid Coblenz, General Pershing reported five missing.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The first American built Handley-Page bombing airplane was turned over to the government on July 6 and passed a perfect test. The machine has a wing spread of 100 feet, and is driven by two Liberty motors of 400 horse-power each, actuating four propellers. The machine is capable of carrying 9000 tons of bombs, and carries two light Browning machine-guns for defense or battle. . . . The Island of Guam was swept by a typhoon on July 6. There was much damage to property. . . . Evangelist Billy Sunday was reported, on July 10, to have undergone a serious operation for hernia at Rochester, Minn. . . . Since the Emergency Fleet Corporation was organized there have been completed under its direction 223 cargo carriers, transports and other craft, aggregating 1,415,022 tons. . . . Henry Ford's first Eagle boat was quietly launched at Detroit, on July 11, twelve more were scheduled for launching within three weeks after which they will go over at the rate of one a day. . . . General Pershing in acknowledging a message from the churches of America, delivered by Dr. Chas. S. MacFarland, asked that the churches "send over their best ministers for chaplains." . . . The Shipping Board has ordered four 10,000 ton cargo ships from the Kiangnan Dock and Engineering Works at Shanghai, China.

Kaiser. Naturally I can only announce here quite generally the lines which were laid down at that time. Regarding the east, we stand on the basis of the peace of Brest-Litovsk." The Chancellor said, however, that the execution of this peace was difficult, because of the conditions in Russia; but he expressed his confidence in the loyal intentions of the present Russian government. The murder of Von Mirbach, the Chancellor laid to the instigation of the Entente Allies to influence Germany into a fresh war, which she intended to avoid. Regarding the possible appointment of Von Hintze, the Chancellor said that he would direct the line of foreign policy, and that he would only consent to the appointment when assured that Von Hintze would follow the Chancellor's lead and not his own. Regarding Belgium von Hertling said: "The present possession of Belgium only means that we have a pawn for future negotiations. We have no intention to keep Belgium in any form whatever." In closing the Chancellor appeared to give further acquiescence to the principle of the Reichstag "no annexation, no indemnity" resolution of last year, and declared, "What we want is the inviolability of our territory, open air for the expansion of our people in the economic domain and, naturally, also security in regard to the future."

ALLIED OFFENSIVE IN THE BALKANS. The principal events of the week in the theater of war came in the Balkans, where recent activity east of Monastir had advanced half-way to the important base of Elbasan on the Skumbi. The Allied forces were said to be working in harmony with the Albanian army.

The front in Albania is linked up with that from Monastir to the Aegean, the total front crossing the Balkan territory being in the neighborhood of 300 miles and being held by a million troops representing seven nations. The western end of the line is held by the Italians, and from there to the neighborhood of Monastir it is held by the French. On both sides of the Vardar there are British troops and the line from the Vardar to the Struma and the sea is held in general by the British, separate sectors being held by Russians, Serbians, Albanians, French and Italians, with a constantly increasing front under control of the reconstituted Greek army. There are also Albanian detachments between the present active front and the Vardar.

ON THE WESTERN FRONT. On the western front Gen. Petain's armies continued to bite into the German-held territory at vital points. On July 8 the French troops broke through the German lines north of the forest of Villers-Cotterets, advancing three-quarters of a mile on a two-mile front, taking important positions and 347 prisoners. On the 11th a further advance in the same region gave the French possession of the village of Longpont and on the 13th the French crossed the Savieres River.

Australian troops on the 8th pressed forward their positions astride the How's Your War Garden?

CROPS good? Weeds discouraged? Money in your pocket? Pretty well satisfied? All right, but now that your war garden is well established how about your soul garden? Any weeds there? Any stony ground? Next week Dr. Francis E. Clark, will talk to us a while about these gardens of ours.

Next week also Maynard Owen Williams will tell his story of the fighting Czechs which got crowded out this week by his newer story of the eating Yanks.

Is your church a power? Read "The Church That Made Good" next week and tell us your answer.

Miss Sangster has had a heart-to-heart talk with a mother whose four-starred service flag means all her sons in France. For the comfort of the splendidly courageous Christian mothers of America, she brings next week a message from this mother.

The Unchangeable Word

THE great theme of "The World after the War" is now attracting universal attention. We have many letters on the subject from our readers, and a variety of speculation is indulged in as to the changes that will begin when peace returns. One clear-sighted minister, looking forward to the new conditions which the world will then have to face, put the situation in a single, concise phrase. Addressing an audience in Mt. Airy, he said: "The great war will leave nothing, except the truth of God's Word, precisely as it found it."

Many and far-reaching will be the changes, some of which are in progress even now. Our valuation of national faith and honor will surely be revised. The right uses of power and authority and wealth will be better apprehended than before. The bases of international relationship, the influence of woman in her new sphere as a real helper in the world's progress; these will be set in a new light in the minds of men everywhere. Then, too, the inestimable preciousness of freedom and liberty—the right of every people to lead their own life and to follow their own best ideals, the right of the worker to the amplest reward for his toil, and the right of the governed everywhere to a voice in the affairs of their own land and its government, will be among the new conditions. Radical changes there will be in many directions: social, economic, political, industrial.

But such speculations, while pleasing and to a certain extent profitable, are largely conjectural. In every instance the wish is father to the thought. We talk of what we believe ought to be, not knowing what will be. Human nature would need to undergo a complete transformation before the full category of such hopes could be realized. Of one thing, however, we can now be assured: the need of God, the indispensability of His Word, and the saving, comforting and vitalizing power of the Gospel, are even now being demonstrated more than at any time in the recollection of those now living. Men feel as never before the reality of the Unchangeable Word.

At the preliminary assembly of the Third World Christian Citizenship Conference in Pittsburgh recently, a clear note was sounded, recognizing the approaching civic reconstruction of society. "The advent of peace," says the declaration of principles, "will introduce the greatest epoch of reconstruction ever known. It must witness not only the rebuilding of homes and schools, of temples and cities, but in many lands and in manifold ways the rebuilding of the very framework of human society. . . . Jesus Christ is King of the nations. His law is the rightful law of our existence. Their governments are under His authority. They are responsible to Him and are preserved and rewarded, or chastised, according to their national righteousness, or their national sins." The Conference held that the danger lay in the possibility that mankind would forget to build upon the sure foundations laid of old. Reconstruction founded upon the material expediences of the past would be false and temporary. "The laws of Jesus Christ must be the foundation. His precepts must bind the superstructure. No nation ever fell while it was right with God."

Our world will thus be a better world, whose peoples will be of one family, with fraternal duty and love toward each other; a world of justice and righteousness, with the Unchangeable Word as the guide and charter of the nations.

The New Sultan

EVEN the most incorrigible of optimists might find it hard to believe in the possibility of Turkey turning over a new leaf and coming into line with the forces of civilization. Yet with the accession of the new Sultan, Valid Eddine, brother of the late ruler, well-informed Turks are in expectation of many changes. The new ruler is represented as a positive anti-German and a friend of the Allies, a man of superior qualities and modern ideas, and one who will not be content to be, as his predecessor was, a mere figurehead. He has a will of his own, they tell us, and "if his ideas have not changed," will exert his influence for a separate peace. Pretty much the same estimate was made when Mohammed V succeeded Abdul Hamid, but the fine expectations quickly evaporated. If Valid Eddine be a strong man, as his friends picture him, and a liberal in politics, some good may result in granting greater freedom and better treatment for the oppressed Armenians, Arabs and Jews. His accession to the throne may prove a turning-point in Turkish history; but it is well not to expect too much. There are natures that are hardened by the actual possession of power, and besides, German influence will be exerted to keep the new Sultan in line as long as Turkey can be made useful to the Kaiser. If he should fling off that influence, he would be a stronger and more independent ruler than even his friends give him credit for. But the "unspeakable Turk" has lived up to his title so long, that hopes of his reformation must be based rather on opportunities after the war, than upon his voluntary adoption of humane policies now. He will accept civilization only as a last resort, when he dares not reject it.

Punishing the Profiteers

IT is regrettable that the Federal Trade Commission's report to the Senate concerning war-time profits smacks more of the stump speech arraignment than of a carefully weighed statement of facts. There are a number of big industries named and some of the profiteering, according to the report, is attributable to "inordinate greed and barefaced fraud." Undoubtedly there is profiteering, big and little, but what the public wants is not a snapshot arraignment but a knowledge of the facts definite and sound enough to supply basis for prosecutions.

It is the meat packers which the Commission singles out for especially heavy condemnation. It charges them with having "preyed upon the public unconscionably." The accusations of the Commission have been indignantly denied by the packers themselves. For example, one company says that the Commission figured the pre-war profit on the total investment, while it figured the war-time profit on the nominal capital, so that the increase was made to appear to be from 8.6 per cent. to 263.7 per cent., while in reality it was only to 14½ per cent.

In striking contrast to the spectacular charges of a Commission which has no powers or responsibilities for the remedy of conditions it pictures, is the silent, insistent course of the Food Administration in correcting wrong conditions. More than 800 penalties for violation of rules and regulations governing licensed dealers in foodstuffs have been imposed during the past ten months by the Food Administration. About 150 companies and individuals have been ordered to quit business in licensed commodities for a limited or unlimited period, and over 500 have voluntarily made a money payment, usually to the Red Cross, or have temporarily abstained from doing business, rather than risk calling down more drastic penalties upon their heads.

A vast number of other cases have been disposed of by Federal food administrators in the various states and territories under the authority of, but without specific appeal to, headquarters at Washington. In a large number of other cases the desired compliance has been secured without penalty. More than 2,500 cases arising out of the shipment of foods and feeds, many of them perishable, have been disposed of.

Swift infliction of punishment direct upon guilty profiteers, or their sharp warning, is far more effective and just than are spectacular accusations based upon mooted methods of bookkeeping. The accusations make the more noise, but the prompt prosecutions work the better service.

The Devil's Punch Bowl

FOR weeks past a lively canvass has been in progress with the view of inducing Congress to enact war-time prohibition before taking a recess. In a test vote, the Senate showed itself favorable to nation-wide prohibition after January 1, 1919, for the remainder of the war, but the House still hangs fire. It is difficult to understand how our legislators, in view of the enormous saving of food and fuel which prohibition would assure, should hesitate at this. All the breweries combined equal one great national brewing-pot, big enough to engulf 43,000,000 bushels of good barley, 2,000,000 bushels of sound rye, 10,000,000 bushels of corn and many millions of pounds of sugar every year, and quite able to keep on indefinitely converting it into a brew sufficient to muddle the nation. According to Congressman Randall of California, in a recent enlightening speech, nine-tenths of the good grain annually dropped into the brew is German-owned. Our government supervises our coal bins and our food supply, to which supervision in view of the necessities of war times we unhesitatingly agree. But why should this frightful waste of good food and fuel—enough to make up for all shortages caused by our big exports—be permitted to go on? 6,000,000 Americans have petitioned Congress for prohibition during the war. They represent at least 40,000,000 more right-thinking citizens who believe that a sober and law-abiding nation is desirable. Why continue to waste the nation's food and coal to keep the devil's punch-bowl of the brewers in active service, when Congress has the power by a single stroke to put it out of business while the war lasts? After that—well, the lesson will then have been learned, and there is little danger that the bowl will ever again be set up, or that any future Congress will pass legislation giving license to put "an enemy in men's mouths to steal away their brains."

Soul Windows

THE face, the mirror of the soul, reveals the inner personality—windows through which we gaze upon each other, beholding character in the reprint upon the face like the light of stars, but it is only a reflection of the beauty within that will shine on forever. We read in the open book of the face unfathomable love in the eye, grace in the portals of the lips, joy or sorrow in tears, blushing delight in the cheek, melody in the voice, a real manifestation of the being we love.

No canvas or marble can fully supply the place of the living face. Artists have taxed their genius to reproduce the face of the Son of God, but they cannot paint the majesty of His look when He said, "Let there be light!", or the infinite tenderness of His love when He whispered, "Come unto Me and I will give you rest!"

Nature vies with art in her gallery of the beautiful representations of His matchless being in stars and suns, in sea and mountain, in sunsets and storms, in fields and forests; all together are but a composite photograph of His wisdom, power and majesty. How much more we would have known if we could have gazed upon His face and listened to His voice when He said, "I am the light of the world, the water of life; I am the vine, ye are the branches." Consider the birds and the lilies, how the Father cares for them. He spake and looked as no other man ever did.

After two thousand years of Christ's shining, we see His face clearer than in the dim light of David's day, but the Psalmist could exclaim, "When Thou saidst, Seek ye my face, my heart said unto Thee, Thy face, Lord will I seek." How our souls often long for the faces we love! Jesus' face helps supply the place of faces at the Front, on the Marne, and of those gone over the last river—

"Whose angel faces smile. Which we have loved long since and lost awhile."

Our Opportunity in Palestine

IN a letter just received from Major Waters of the Christian Herald staff, who is now with the Red Cross Commission in Palestine, the writer says: "I have been thinking a great deal about our plans as to Palestine. I think the idea of founding an institution for the orphan children of the Holy Land is one of the great need of which can not be doubted. From all I can find out, hundreds of thousands of families have been rendered homeless and the need of homes for the little orphans (their parents having died) is very great. It will be part of my work to investigate conditions and needs, and I will then be in a better position to judge of what ought to be done."

We feel that the whole future of the Holy Land, and especially the problem of shepherding the little children who have been made parentless through the war, is one that lies very near to the hearts of the readers of the Christian Herald. There is no land on earth that has such a strong claim upon our loving consideration and helpfulness. And if the survey of the situation should result in opening up the way for a work that will especially belong to the great Christian Herald Family, we believe it would be undertaken with confidence that the divine blessing would rest upon it.

Sacrifice

WHEREVER the soul leads and the conscience approves, there is never a needless or useless sacrifice. Every step in the real progress of the race since time began has come out of sacrifice. Our growth Christward and heavenward is accomplished by continuous struggle and renunciation. And if the price paid be great, the gain is sure to be commensurate. The greatest Sacrifice of all—that which redeemed the world—is the exemplar for the Christian who loves God and his fellowmen. It makes very real to him the great truth that while a non-sacrificial life is unproductive and unprogressive, to him who is ready to give all, victory is assured.

Why Should Christians Study Prophecy?

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I

THE Christian Herald has asked for my views as to the right attitude of God's people towards prophecy, or as expressed in the title, "Why Should Christians Study Prophecy?"

1. The most obvious answer is that prophecy is part of the Bible, part of God's revelation to man. A Christian, in the New Testament sense of the term, is one who has come to know and love God through faith in the atoning merits of His Son, Jesus Christ. Hence he loves God's Word, and he has not the slightest doubt that the Bible is His Word.

2. But prophecy covers a large part of the Bible. We commonly think of the seventeen books of the Old Testament, Isaiah to Malachi, and one book of the New Testament, Revelation, just eighteen books of prophecy in all. And if this were all, it would be nearly one-third of the whole. But it is not all. Some of the most important prophecies are in the Pentateuch, the Psalms are largely prophetic, and so is the Gospel of Matthew. One of the most comprehensive and illuminating prophecies is in the Acts, and what of I and II Corinthians, I and II Thessalonians, and the Pastoral and General epistles? Taking it in bulk, more than one-half of the Bible is predictive, so that no further reason seems necessary why Christians should study prophecy.

3. Prophecy has great importance attached to it in the Bible. God justifies Himself as the God of truth by saying: "Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare; before they spring forth I tell you of them" (Isaiah 42:9).

Why is Jeremiah, though a political prisoner, directed of God to buy his cousin's field in Anathoth? To buy it, even when he knows that Jerusalem is doomed and his nation is to be carried into captivity? To buy it with all the formality of the counting of the money, the signing and sealing of the deed, the calling of witnesses, and the depositing of the papers in safe keeping? This is the answer: "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, the God of Israel: Houses and fields and vineyards shall yet again be bought in this land" (32:6-15). In other words, Judah was to be restored from her Babylonian captivity and again at the end of this age, and God desired it to be known that it was done by His hand.

"He that eateth bread with me, hath lifted up his heel against me. Now I tell you before it come, that when it is come to pass, ye may believe that I am He" (John 13:18, 19). These words of Christ give us the key to prophecy and tell us why Christians should study it. It is revealed so that when it comes to pass we may be convinced that He is the One Whom He claimed to be, the very Son of God, the Saviour of them that believe and the Judge of the whole earth.

4. Prophecy in its fulfillment is a great strengthener of faith. The older apologists classed it with miracles in this respect. They pointed out that miracles furnished the more impressive testimony for the beginning of the Christian era, but prophecy for its close. In other words, prophecy is an argument whose force is continually growing. Beginning when the first prophecy was fulfilled and increasing as fulfillments increase, its maturity will not be reached till the end of the world. As Prof. S. H. Kellogg reminds us, "the whole of the Old Testament was in the hands of the Jews 400 years B. C., and yet their predictions were not only borne out by events in His life and work, but are still in process of fulfillment before our eyes. Nor are the essential facts which bear upon this matter at all affected by modern criticism. Let every book be brought down to the latest date which that criticism claims, and still there is a large residuum of veritable prophecy written long, long before the occurrence of the events foretold." Eighteen hundred years have elapsed since the last book of prophecy was written and during that long period, the leading events of history have proven in a marvellous way that "holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Peter 1-2, 1).

5. Prophecy strengthens faith because it so greatly increases knowledge. As the psalmist says: "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him; and He will show them His covenant" (25:14). Think what prophecy meant to Noah and his family in the building of the ark. Think how it enabled Abraham successfully to intercede for Lot in Sodom. It sustained Moses in leading the Hebrews out of Egypt and Joshua in conquering Canaan. Again and again it nerved Israel's arm for battle by the prediction of victory, and if today our statesmen and warriors and other public leaders knew and believed the prophecies of God, the fear of Germany would be materially diminished. Daniel knew by the prophetic books the number of years that spanned the Babylonian captivity for His people, and as a scholar and statesman, he stood unequalled among all his contemporaries. Simeon and Anna were diligent students of prophecy and God honored them with an actual vision of their Redeemer. The poor saints at Jerusalem were relieved in the famine of the period of Claudius Caesar as the result of Agabus' prophesying. Paul's prophesying in the Adriatic heartened all his fellow-voyagers in their hour of shipwreck.

Some months since, a metropolitan divine uttered a cry of despair over world conditions and the hopelessness of the reformation of mankind; but had he been a closer student of prophecy, he might have spared himself and us part of that despondency. As the late J. D. Herr said at an International Prophetic Conference some years ago: "There is one grand event placed before us on which we can rest our faith and plant our hope amid all the sad disasters and spiritual depressions constantly surrounding the walls of Zion. No seeming defeat of moral reform, no beating back of the armies of truth, no attempt to overthrow the bulwarks of Christianity, shakes our confidence or paralyzes our aggressive efforts. Beyond and above all these is seen the outshining of His power, and we wait in expectancy and humble patience for the appearing of the glory, of our Great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Here is the objective point of all prophecy."

6. This reminds us that prophecy, properly understood, is a wonderful inspirer of hope. In other words, pessimism and Bible prophecy do not go together. It is through the latter that we learn the world's destiny, and become assured that the march of the centuries is toward a legitimate and glorious future. Thus Peter says: "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn and the day-star arise in your hearts" (2 Peter 1:19).

He is thinking of Christ's transfiguration on the mount when he says this, which to him was at once a pledge and a specimen of the second coming of Christ in His kingdom. That event, i. e., the transfiguration, made the word of prophecy more sure. It was "an indubitable declaration of the personal and official glory of Jesus Christ, a sufficient warrant for all that he and the other apostles said concerning Him."

But the point is that in the estimation of the inspired penman, "prophecy" is a "light," a lamp shining "in a dark place." The Greek for "dark" in this instance might be rendered "squalid." O, the squalor of the filthy, blood-besmirched world today! How much it needs light! And the prophetic Word of God is that light. What shall the church do with it? Hide it under a bushel, or hold it forth for the guidance and the cheer of men? Prophecy is speculation and impractical they tell us; but what can be more contrary to such an idea than the thought of a lamp shining in a dark place?

And if the present state of the world is a "dark place," what is the "day-dawn," if not the second coming of Christ to set up His kingdom? "He shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds." This "star-day" is to rise in our hearts, Peter says. There is, in other words, a moral and spiritual rising that must precede the outward splendor of that day to them who shall behold it. Is this true of the reader of these words? Has he yet received Jesus Christ as His Saviour and confessed Him as his Lord? It is as he does this that prophecy becomes to him an inspirer of hope.

7. Thus Christians should study the prophecy because it exalts Jesus Christ. "To Him give all the prophets witness" (Acts 10:43). All prophecy from Genesis to Revelation relates to Him directly or indirectly. "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken," said He to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, and then, "beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning Himself" (Luke 24:25, 27). The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy (Rev. 19:10). No one interested either in His past history or His ultimate triumph can afford to ignore its study. "God never would have traced the exalted pathway of His Son through the long aisles of the future, had He not desired and expected us by our eye of faith to follow Him."

8. If prophecy thus exalts Jesus Christ, and by exalting Him strengthens the faith and increases the knowledge and quickens the hope of men, it stands to reason that it radically affects their conduct. No surprise is felt, therefore, when we read that the pagans of Thessalonica, "turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God and to wait for His Son from heaven" (1 Thess. 1:9, 10). We see what prophecy did for them. Peter teaches us that by the "exceeding great and precious promises" (prophecy again), we escape "the corruption that is in the world through lust" (2 Peter 1:4). John declares that "every man that hath this hope in Him" (Christ's Second Coming), "purifieth himself even as He is pure" (1 John 3:1-3), (prophecy again). Indeed, to quote Dr. Rufus W. Clark of honored memory in Albany, "there is not a duty pertaining to the Christian life that is not quickened and rendered more imperative by the power of this blessed hope; not a virtue that it does not call into highest exercise, not a motive in the human heart that it does not purify and strengthen."

II

But if prophecy is, and does all this, why do not Christians study it more generally than they do? Yankee-like, we answer that question by asking another, "Why do not Christians study the Bible more generally than they do?" If they studied the Bible at all, in any serious way, how could they fail to study prophecy?

Is prophecy too difficult? Will it be said that God sends a message to mock our humble efforts? His answer is that the longest and most difficult prophecy in the Bible is distinguished from every other part of it by the name of "Revelation." If that is a misnomer, God is responsible for it, since it is in the text.

The mistakes and extravagances of theorists are sometimes adduced as an argument against prophecy; but men have wandered away from fundamental doctrines of the Bible and even given "heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons," yet have Christians discarded the study of those doctrines? The truth is that, as Dr. John Lillie, the American Commentator, tells us, among those who really deserve to be called students of prophecy, there is greater harmony on essential points than is found in other departments of theological science, while their divergences on the other hand are not by any means as mischievous in character or tendency. A New York clergyman recently said that the Bible Institutes of the country were all teaching the premillennial coming of Christ, and then he sought to disparage the teaching by adding that they were all at variance with one another. Quite the opposite is true. The ten or a dozen Bible Institutes, or schools, which the writer knows will bear out absolutely Dr. Lillie's testimony.

THE Woman's Christian Temperance Union is doing welfare work at the Army cantonments, training stations, and aviation fields.

One of the most complete organizations is at Camp Devens, Ayer, Mass. Here two hostess houses have been established. One house has reading-rooms, recreation rooms, and rooms that are rented to the boys' families when they come for visits to the camp. The second house has a hall with seating capacity for 150 people.

At Camp Funston the Kansas W. C. T. U. is maintaining two hostess houses. In Washington, D. C., the boys are provided with good reading material and come in contact with pleasant surroundings and a refined atmosphere. Each of the 16 Army cantonments where the W. C. T. U. have their "huts" has a stereomicrograph. The slides are educational as well as entertaining.

The field kitchen fund touches another phase of W. C. T. U. work. These kitchens are for the battle front and provide the men with hot drinks and nourishing food as they return exhausted and hungry from the firing line.

Among the Workers

A PARTY of Christian workers under the leadership of Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Norton, returning from a month's trip through France, where they held many evangelistic meetings near the front, reported some wonderful conversions among the Belgian soldiers, to whom they distributed 25,000 Christmas boxes, besides 7,000 to prisoners of war in Germany. Each soldier sent a letter of thanks, and received a Testament by return mail. The Belgian Minister of War sent the Nortons a hearty expression of gratitude, with an invitation to repeat the visit at the next Easter season.

IN preparation for its Christmas drive 600,000 Red Cross Christmas Seals have been printed, according to an announcement made by the National Tuberculosis Association. This is by far the greatest number ever issued and the objective in view is at least to double last year's sale, which totaled over 175,000,000, 60% more than in any year previous.

EVANGELIST CHARLES REIGN SCOVILLE writes that the revival campaign at Trinidad, Colo., has been a notable success, and adds: "We have given the invitation here three days, with 788 responding."

Wonderful Grace!

A SERMON BY REV. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, D.D.*

TEXT—Isa. 49: 2. "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins."

IF this text is put in contrast with numerous New Testament stories, it seems to give us an altogether wrong conception of God, for I remember that Jesus said, "He that hath seen me hath seen my Father also," and therefore, if properly understood, the God of the Old Testament is the same in spirit as Jesus in the New Testament. And when I see Jesus forgiving Mary Magdalene, although she had sinned grievously, and when I watch Him, as He writes in the sand at His feet the forgiveness of the woman who had been taken in her sin, telling her to go and sin no more, in contrast with these two stories this Old Testament text certainly demands an explanation.

I have found God's grace in the New Testament and His love in the Old Testament to be very much the same.

This text is a part of the comforting message which God sent to His people while they were still in darkness and almost in despair. It is associated with their deliverance from captivity, and at once teaches to me the lesson that God did not permit His people in the Old Testament to suffer beyond a certain point, nor does He permit us today to be tempted beyond that we are able to bear.

The story of the captivity of the children of Israel is thrilling, and at the same time pathetic in the extreme. When we speak of their captivity, we usually think of the seventy years between the first invasion of Judea by Nebuchadnezzar and the permission for their return to the city they left which was given to them by Cyrus. This bit of history is found between the years 605 and 536 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, began his attacks on God's people and his depredations upon the city so dear to them, in the year 605 B.C. At first he carried away only a few prisoners, but among them we find Daniel and his companions.

IN B.C. 598 he came again and took away ten thousand people. The seventy years' captivity really began in the year 588 B.C., and when for the fourth time Nebuchadnezzar invaded Judea. He took Jerusalem after a siege of eighteen months, and the king Zedekiah and his people were transported to Babylon. The distance between Jerusalem and Babylon, the scene of their captivity, is about seven hundred miles. It was a remarkable procession which moved from one city to another. Families were not separated, but marched together. Many of the people driven into captivity walked in fetters, and the picture of this strange company of people moving from Jerusalem to Babylon is one of the most interesting in history.

It is, however, almost, if not quite equalled, by the rush out from Siberia of the prisoners who for so many years have been held there by the autocratic government of Russia. With the overthrow of the Czar, 100,000 dead men and women arose from their tombs of imprisonment so fast that the blacksmiths were too few and too slow to break off their shackles. A picture is given of 60,000 men jingling their leg- and arm-chains to celebrate their deliverance. 50,000 sledges were driven westward as fast as possible before the snow and ice could melt; the roads became impassable, and the great throngs of the once hopeless found themselves forming such a pageant as the world had never seen, except we have in mind the moving into captivity of God's ancient people.

THE difference between these two throngs of people, however, is this: God's people, whose story is found in the Old Testament, were moving towards captivity. The Siberian people are moving towards freedom. In their captivity the people of Israel suffered year after year. Their consciences must have troubled them, because they knew that their captivity was due to their sin; yet they were not without hope, because, while many of them had forgotten God in the olden days, yet they still had a memory of His dealings with them, and they knew that, sooner or later, their sufferings must end. There was a certain amount of freedom given to them in captivity; some rose to positions of power and influence; others became extremely wealthy, but they were a disorganized and distracted people, and of themselves could do nothing. It was upon the ears of such a people that the Word of God, like a chorus, broke in, and these words recorded in Isaiah 40: 1-2 "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that the iniquity is pardoned: for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins," remind one of nothing so much as the angels' songs which aroused the sleeping shepherds outside of Bethlehem.

Sir Robertson Nicoll has said concerning it, "The very grammar of this verse is eloquent with grace," and he says that the verse should literally be translated thus—"Accomplished is her warfare, absolved is her guilt, expiated her sins," at least this is the meaning of the verse. It is to be noted that the warfare is not mentioned first, neither is the guilt, nor the sins; but God in His grace is speaking first of the accomplishment of the warfare, the absolving of the guilt, and the expiation of the sins. This is wonderful grace indeed!

With this thought in mind then let us go back to the text, "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins." Does this mean "double punishment" inflicted for wrong doing? That could hardly be in accordance with God's nature. Certainly, it is not in line with His dealings with wandering men whose stories run from Genesis to Revelation.

I AM wondering if this text may not mean that, when one sins, there is always a double penalty; that is, we do not live to ourselves alone, and the innocent always suffer with the guilty.

The other day, there came to me a paper from Australia, in which the following striking and awful sentences are found. Fully 25% of the sick children in Melbourne are touched by disease because their parents have sinned. Every tenth child in Australia, it is said, carries in its blood the poison of its parents' vice. What fact more terrible can be imagined?

This is proved not only in the Word of God, but in everyday life. When a boy's father goes wrong we can quite understand how the son would go astray; and when the Jews pass Absalom's tomb today and hurl stones against it in evidence of their contempt for him, Absalom is reaping a harvest of his own sowing, but he is also reaping the harvest forced upon him by his father, David, and his rebellion against his father is in part the result of his father's weakness. The pity of it is that we do not need to sin many times to start a wave of evil influence which may ruin and wreck the lives of children yet unborn.

It is also made exceedingly plain to us as we read the newspapers, and keep our eyes open and look about us, that there is this double penalty, the innocent suffering with the guilty.

BUT true as may be the statement that the innocent pay the penalty with the guilty, yet I am quite sure that this is not the meaning of the text.

It is also true that we do not suffer alone in this world. The guilty, of course, suffer. When they walk in the way of the transgressors, conscience condemns them and remorse overwhelms them.

In an Ohio city, a man came to me insisting that he must have a private interview. His face was deathly white, and when alone with me he said: "I am a forger. I have been able to cover my sin over for years, and I thought I was going to escape judgment; but I am being found out, and every day I am expecting to be arrested. When the door-bell of my house rings, I am in torture, for I say to myself, 'Is this an officer?' As I walk the streets of the city, I am afraid to look men in the face, lest a detective should be searching for me; and, sir, it is true that I am literally in hell and do not know how to escape."

While it is true that the guilty suffer, yet others, entirely innocent, suffer with them. A man becomes a drunkard and his wife's heart is broken. A boy sins and his parents are crushed. A girl goes astray and the shadow falling across the household is blacker than midnight.

This is the pathos of life; this is the tragedy of sin. We do not suffer alone; others suffer with us. We have no right to make them suffer; yet true as this is, I am persuaded that this is not the meaning of my text. What then?

It was a rule under the law in the olden times that for all manner of trespass a man condemned by the Jews should pay double. "For all manner of trespass, whether it be for ox, for ass, for sheep, for raiment, or for any manner of lost thing, which another challengeth to be his, the cause of both parties shall come before the judges; and whom the judges shall condemn, he shall pay double unto his neighbor." (Exodus 22-9.) But this verse in Exodus is not to be put over against my text in Isaiah, which reads: "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins."

SOMEONE has said that in this text God is considering the sufferings of the sinner, and if this be true, how full of pity God is to take into account the suffering that sinners have brought upon themselves, and how wonderful it is that he would reckon these sufferings as being double in force and power for the sins committed, and yet if that were true, the suffering of the sinner cannot atone for sin.

But there is a way of escape, and the way of escape is indicated in this Old Testament text: "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins."

Some years ago I was holding a meeting in the city of Denver, and the Rev. Dr. Bailey, pastor of the Congregational Church, an Arabic scholar of note, came to me one day to say, "Here's a beautiful subject for you," and this text of mine was written on a piece of paper, and the explanation was given which my friend considered in harmony with the context, and certainly it is in harmony with the plan and purpose of God. When we read the expression, "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins," we are reminded of the old custom which prevailed in the days of God's ancient people of providing for an obligation. It was done in this way: A piece of parchment was taken, across this piece of parchment the obligation was written, and the debtor signed his name. Then the parchment was folded and it was indented in the center and it was torn at the place of indenture, and half of the parchment was taken by the debtor and half by the creditor. When the obligation was met, then the debtor received from the creditor the second piece of parchment, and so had her double, and it was the rule to take the double parchment and nail it to the door so that all passing by might see that the debt had been paid and the obligation removed. It seems to me that this interpretation must be permitted, because I have read that the expression which immediately precedes the text, "her iniquity is pardoned," really means, "her iniquity is paid off," just as a debt is cancelled.

IT is a very striking thing to me that in the New Testament text a Scripturo may be found which carries this same teaching from the Old Testament to the New. It is in Colossians 2nd chapter and the 14th verse, and reads as follows: "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to His cross." Is this not a striking picture? Think of it: the handwriting that was against us, blotted out, the charges on the book of God met, things which might face us at the judgment day completely erased; for to be blotted out is a chemical expression, and thus I am taught that even the marks of sin may be removed by divine forgiveness. It is a mathematical expression, and as the payment of a sum of money provides for a debt, so by His marvelous atonement my sins are put away forever. It is a judicial term, and because one is in the presence of God who has met all the claims of the law, I am justified freely and forever and stand acquitted before God.

But the text is even more remarkable than this. I am told that the handwriting that was against us has been taken out of the way and nailed to His cross. If it is out of the way then, I shall not meet it again, nor can it overpower me again.

NATURALLY we say: "What are the sins that have been nailed to the cross and for which we are so freely and so fully forgiven?" First: Sins against God. There is the sin of rebellion, the sin of being at enmity against God, the sin of rejection and resistance, our sin of unbelief which drove Jesus to the cross and broke His heart. This sin is nailed to the cross. There is the sin against God of ingratitude; He has given us everything and we have given Him nothing; He has loved us and we have trampled His love beneath our feet; He has given us a countless number of blessings and we have not said, "thank you."

AT the age of eighty-one, there died at Burbank, California, the Rev. Edward W. Speneer, D.D., who at a particular moment of his life, seized the great opportunity and filled it with daring and skill. He was the hero of the wreck of the "Lady Elgin," a lake steamer that foundered off the shore at Winnetka, Illinois, just above Evanston, upon the morning of September 8, 1860, and nearly 400 of the crew

Things Concealed

SUNDAY, July 28. Prov. 25:2. "It is the glory of God to conceal a thing." The Lord conceals that he may the more abundantly reveal. He hides a thing in order that we may have the refining discipline of seeking for it, and enjoy the keen delights of discovery. Things which are come at easily are esteemed lightly. The pebble that lies upon the common way is beneath regard. The pearl that lies buried in ocean depths is a treasure of rare price. The pain of getting intensifies the joy of possessing. If everything could be picked up from the surface, life would become exceedingly superficial. But the best things are concealed.

"The kingdom of heaven is like unto a treasure hid in a field." We have to dig for our wealth. We are called to a life of toil and discipline and research. Things are concealed in order that life may be a perpetual inquest. The only healthy life is the life of ardent inquisitiveness. "Ask." "Seek." "Knock."

But where shall I make my search? I never know where the wealth may be concealed. The patch of ground which appears to be the most unpromising may be the hiding-place of the finest gold. Therefore I will interrogate the commonplace; I will search into the humdrum ways of life; I will pierce into the heart of tame and sober duties; I will look for treasure even in the dark cloud. I will assume that there is a dowry of grace even in the ministry of pain. I will search for the wealth of poverty, the advantage of apparent disadvantage, the jewels that may be in the heaviest grief. I will look for the hidden treasure, for "it is the glory of God to conceal a thing." It is the glory of God to conceal his teaching in the hard and toilsome ways of experience. I come to know when I have begun to do. The doctrine is hidden in the obedience. J. H. J.

A Great Partnership

MONDAY, July 29. Phil. 2:12, 13. "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling: for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Is salvation then a matter of works? No, we are saved by faith, but faith activates, as scientists would say, or as the apostle James puts it, vindicates itself by works: "I, by my works, will show thee my faith." Paul is writing to people who are already saved, but he urges them to manifest their faith personally and practically. Salvation is of faith in order to good works. A noble Christian motto is, "Saved to serve." We are called to work. Our field is the world, the world within and the world without. There is work to do in our own hearts, in our own homes, and neighborhoods, in our own land. Life in its widest relations is affected only as life is affected in its narrowest relations. Jesus' first field of labor was his home at Nazareth and the carpenter-shop of his foster-father. God gives no one of us a foreign mission without having first proved our fidelity at home. "Do the duty that lies nearest thee." Yet no narrow view of life should prevent our doing our full share in making the world a better place to dwell in. Great wrongs are to be righted and great causes are to be advanced. Struggling reforms are to maintain. Corruption is to be cured by the salt of righteousness. This is God's world, and sin is a usurper in it. Christ Jesus has a right to rule and reign, and all his servants are soldiers, and all his soldiers are called to fight the good fight.

We do not work alone who work for God. He works in us, through us, with us, by us, and beside us. He bears the heavy end of the yoke. He rests us when we are weary, and by his Spirit energizes us when we grow languid. It is a great partnership. C. C. A.

Law and Grace

TUESDAY, July 30. I Tim. 1:8. "We know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully." What, then, is the lawful use of the law? We should use it as a very sick man uses his physician, when he applies to him for information regarding his state of health. The results of a diagnosis instituted for us by the law will be very painful and humiliating, but it will be very beneficial, because our eyes will be opened to our true condition. Our carnal security will be punctured, and our inward ease greatly disturbed, but into the disquiet which an earnest application of the law has created in us will fall the voice of Jesus: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden; I will give you rest." We will turn from the law to Him who is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. The law cannot heal the diseases which it discovered to us; it cannot make straight what it has found crooked in us; it cannot allay the fears which it has roused. But Jesus can, and to Jesus the law should drive us, when we study its lessons properly. It is to become our schoolmaster, driving us to the great Physician and Teacher whom God has appointed for all who are troubled about their sins. When by faith we have accepted the fulfillment which Jesus has rendered to the law as our own, and our relation to God is no longer that of slaves who dread the whip of the master but of children who regard God as their dear Father, we are to take up the study of the law afresh, and in the spirit of the new life which faith has begotten in us we are to make the duties which the law imposes on us our own voluntary choice, and express to God our heartfelt gratitude for the salvation which he has procured for us by his Son by the willing service which we render him according to all his holy commandments. In this new state we no longer dread the accusations of the law, nor do we feel its injunctions as an unbearable burden, but we love it as the perfect rule of life. The grace of our Lord enables us to apply the law to our conduct in daily renewal.

Witnesses to God

WEDNESDAY, July 31. Isa. 43:12. "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, that I am God." The fact that the soul panteth after God, crying, "Oh that I knew where I might find him!" is evidence that God lives and loves. Desire, the breath of the soul, is an inspiration from heaven. It is an appetite for God, like the body for food, like the bud to bloom, the bird to soar and sing. The wings of longing may be clipped by doubt or sin, or burdened and weighted by indifference and worldliness. Then there is no God near, no heavens to sweep with the wings of faith and hope.

The height of our flight is measured by the depth of our desire. How wonderful that we may rise up to rest under the shadow of his wings and sing for joy, "Thou art my God; I will praise thee." I will witness for thee forever more. The secret place of the Most High must be attained if the heart would know that he is God, and be able to tell the world of his love. The ideal of an everlasting flight is ever before the believing spirit; mounting up upon wings as eagles towards the heavenly eyrie is the ambition of the mortal for the immortal. There you experience what you only believed before. Everywhere you fly is God, and beside him there is none else.

Nature is a witness to God's power, wisdom and immanence. "Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge." Mind is the author of matter; spirit controls force, and God is in his worlds. They witness, "The hand that made us is divine."

But man, crowned with glory and honor, for whom nature was created, witnesses to the love of God, illuminating his entire being, that the Architect of the universe loves, preserves, redeems and saves his people. E. W. C.

Loving God With All Our Strength

THURSDAY, August 1. Mark 12:30. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy strength." What is it to love the Lord with all our strength? A banquet of business men closed with the singing of "America." At the last stanza there was one man who sang with all his heart, and was apparently deeply stirred. He looked up and saw the flag that was draped above the table, and when the singing ended he said, "Dear old flag, I could die for you." Just three weeks later he was arrested, tried and convicted of an attempt to bribe several members of a municipal assembly. How he "loved the flag!" But only with his lips—not with his strength. Perhaps our love for God has been too often of that variety. "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not what I say?" It was God's complaint against a certain people that they served him only with their lips. Lip-service is acceptable only when it reflects heart-service, and heart-service finds its perfect fruit only in life-service. To love God with all our strength is to love him with hands and feet, purse and time, to love him through the length of all our days. Love which grows cold and forgets or neglects duty may be the love of admiration, but it is not the love of communion, nor is it the love of loyalty. No man who loves the flag of his country will either dishonor it or disregard his obligation to defend it in times of peril.

A boy of twenty who enlisted in the Marine Corps obtained the consent of his parents to his enlistment in an interview in which he said, "I can not even look at the flag any longer unless I do something for the flag. It seems to say to me whenever I look at it, 'What have you done—what are you doing for me?'"

Am I your flag or not?" An earnest Christian has some such feeling as this when he sees the symbol of the Cross. The blood-red banner as it "streams afar" seems to say, "Who follows in my train?" An increasing number of disciples of Christ daily seek to know how to serve him with all their strength. C. C. A.

The Uses of the War

FRIDAY, August 2. I Tim. 1:8. "We know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully." Paul has already expressed his view of the intrinsic excellency of the holy law of God, in the text we had before us last Tuesday. The thought, therefore, which the present text might suggest is that the goodness of the law is conditioned upon the use which men make of it. That can never be the sense, or else we should have to hold that God made something that was not good and man had to make it good. What the apostle really means to say is that we must be careful not to use the law, which is good in itself, for purposes which it does not serve. It would be an unlawful use of the law if sinful man were to seek his righteousness before God in the law. The law, when rightly applied to sinful man, only argues his guilt before God. He can establish his unrighteousness, but not his righteousness, from the law. It creates unrest in his conscience, but it gives him no peace, because he has not met and cannot meet the one condition on which approval of man's actions by the law depends: complete fulfillment. No Redeemer would have been needed by fallen man, if he could render to God fully that service which he owes him. To seek righteousness from the law is a virtual denial of the redemptive work of Christ.

Another unlawful use of the law is to seek our moral improvement from the law. The law states, indeed, all that is necessary for a holy life, but it does not create such a life. It names duties, but it does not furnish man the strength for enacting them. The fundamental requirement for a proper obedience to the law is love—love of God and love of our neighbor. The law does not produce that love in man. In the spirit of ancient Pharisaism men may make a pretense of fulfilling the law in a mechanical and external manner, but their acts are worthless because they do not spring from the right motive. Neither our justification nor our sanctification springs from the law. They must be obtained from Jesus Christ, who was made unto us righteousness, and who instills in our heart that new spirit which loves the law and counts its commandments not grievous. W. H. T. D.

Tests of Love

SATURDAY, August 3. I Kings 3:25. "The king said, Divide the living child in two, give half to the one, and half to the other." Two women claimed the same child; the false mother was willing that Solomon should with the sword divide the living child, but the real mother, amid sobs and tears, cried out, "O my lord, give her the living child, and in no wise slay it." Then the wise king said, "Give her the living child; she is the mother thereof." Love, stronger than death, proved motherhood. Mother love could not be successfully counterfeited before the wise ruler. The pretender had no depth of affection for the little one. An adopted child in the home of the best of parents cannot inspire that wonderful love which fills the heart of parenthood and which cries, "My child, my life, my all!" All that a mother hath will she give for her child, following him to the gallows. She will love him more the older he grows, even until the head is white with age, for love is eternal.

A little girl once cried out, "Mamma, my dollie never loves me back as I do." Therefore the child soon outgrows the doll, but the mother never outgrows the child. The dear one may become estranged, refusing to respond to a mother's affection, and then at last love dies under such iceberg conditions. A truant son once returned to his mother's bedside, and when she saw how cold, heartless and pitiless his face appeared, scared and hardened by sin, she whispered in her dying moments, "I have never wholly lost my boy till now, never till now!" So the Mother God of heaven utters sorrowful words when lost children refuse the invitation to come to the bosom of love, the Home of the Soul. Love never dies till the loved one smothered the flame forever. E. W. C.

The Unwitting Bait

By
JEAN MAHAN PLANK

MISS JESSIE ALLING opened the telephone booth in the drug-store and peered about nervously for a place to hang her limp, shabby muff. She finally let it swing from her wrist, and with some difficulty adjusted her eye-glasses in order to hunt for a number in the directory.

"Central, eight-three-naught-one," she called in a shaking voice as she slipped a slug in the slot.

A polite, youthful voice answered at once with a rising inflection: "Consolidated Building and Construction Company."

"O—is Mr.—can I talk with Tom Wilk—Mr. Thomas Wilkinson, please?"

The polite one hesitated. "One moment, please!"

After an instant an older voice came through more commandingly. "To whom did you wish to speak?"

"Mr. Wilkinson. Doesn't he work there?—Thomas Wil—"

"Just a moment, please!"

Another interval passed before a third voice came briskly: "What is it, please? With whom do you want to speak?"

"Why, I'd like to talk with Mr. Thomas Wilkinson. Doesn't he work there?"

"Well—the brisk one also hesitated, "will you kindly give me your name?"

"Miss Alling. If you'll just tell him Jessie Alling. I'm so sorry to trouble—"

"One moment, please!"

Flushed and perspiring, Miss Alling waited. Her thoughts were agitated. "My, what a lot of bother I'm giving those big men. They sound big. I suppose Tom works away out somewhere—"

"Hello—hello!"

"Why, I believe that's Tom now. Is that you—Tom Wilkinson?"

"Yes, Wilkinson. The clerk didn't get your name."

"Why, Tom, this is Jessie Alling. Don't you remember—Arden Seminary?"

Tom remembered with an exclamation. "Why, where are you?"

"I live here—in Chicago now—taking care of my mother's cousin, an invalid. Tom, I won't keep you from your work. I just want to tell you something. You know that the Arden Alumni are raising ten thousand dollars for a memorial of Professor Arden?"

"I've heard it mentioned," said Tom, "several times."

"Well, some of them—the younger ones—are going to have a big dinner at the Auditorium to see about it."

"Yes—that's been mentioned, too."

"And of course it's rather expensive—and they're all of late classes—Clyde Bryce's boy is getting it up. Now, I thought maybe some of us who went to school away back might get together here in Hyde Park and do something."

"Yes, yes!"

"And maybe if we put what we have to give together, it would be—a little help anyway. Now I found Fred Gates in the directory and called him up where he works, and—he's married, did you know it?"

"Yes, I knew it, Jessie."

"He lives on a farm, away out. He and his wife will come. And there's a tea house near where I live, and we can get a nice dinner for sixty cents. Then we can put together what we're going to give, and send it in. What do you think, Tom?"

"I think that's just bully, Jessie."

"Do you?"

"I do, indeed. Now, when—"

"It'll be Saturday, at six. Will that—"

"Good! I'll have to be a bit later than that—say six fifteen?"

"Very well, Tom. I wouldn't want to interfere with your work. Say, Tom—I was sorry to bother those gentlemen—about calling you to the phone, you know. Did it—"

"O, they'll live through it," said Tom cheerfully, and Jessie recalled that Tom had always been a bit independent in

"I do—look—awful," was her conclusion as she surveyed the picture: a ready-made blouse which had struggled through many launderings; a well-preserved tailored skirt of an obviously old cut; a hat which, in spite of a thick veil, confessed to being straw when the month had an R in it, while its faded velvet rose tried bravely to simulate bloom when it really ought to have been dropping its leaves.

Jessie sat down on the cane-seated chair which was the only one the little third floor room afforded.

"It doesn't seem as if I ought to draw out any more with that ten dollars; but if I just had a pretty blouse now, I could wear it with my old black taffeta skirt

Her heart sank as she thought of the events of the morning which had given her the impulse and the courage to start her small project of the tea house dinner. She had gone timidly to a meeting of the alumni downtown. In the chair was a sweetly fearless young woman whom Jessie knew to be the married daughter of one of her own classmates. The young president was clad in a thoroughly modern fashion, the very simplicity of which was bewildering to one who did not know how to attain it. Jessie had watched with fascinated wonder this girl whom she could remember as a baby, hold the assembly lightly but firmly as one holds hounds in leash. Jessie knew that she could not have done that.

She belonged to the day of small things, when her alma mater did not even dream of association with the A. C. A.; when college life was simple, perhaps a bit crude, and living was difficult. Living had remained difficult for Jessie, with music teaching, helping her parents through their last years, and now partial dependence upon a capricious old lady.

Not knowing the younger alumni, Jessie sat in shabby loneliness until young Clyde Bryce happened to ask her name. He was a cheerful, voluble and elegant young man. His sophisticated attire and airy ease of manner suggested ways of life which Miss Alling knew only in books. She returned his greeting with timid awe.

"That ten thousand is a scorecher," he confided to her in a whisper. "I'm chairman of the committee. I've had all I could do to get that dinner started for Saturday night at the Auditorium. Everybody shies away when you want money. There's a lot of 'em who ought to give two hundred apiece, and they've put down a hundred. That won't do. I've been angling for some big fish that might be worked up to the five hundred mark, but they won't come to the dinner—don't believe in it—two and a half a plate too high, and so forth. But what can a fellow do?—Hello, Geoffrey, how about those invites?"

In the confusion of adjournment, he turned away. Miss Alling's sympathetic murmur was lost. Most of her remarks were lost, she realized, in this surging atmosphere of prosperous youth.

Fluttered and depressed, Jessie went out. She loved the old seminary. It had been the scene of the nearest approach to romance her life had known. And the old professor—she had loved him, too. Her lip quivered, and for the first time, her stout little heart thought bitterly of poverty.

Then suddenly the Project flashed upon her brain. She remembered that Tom Wilkinson lived in Chicago, and Fred Gates. Those boys had worked their way through school. Life had of course been hard for them, also. Two and a half a plate! The price quoted so glibly by Clyde Bryce had taken away her breath. She knew Tom Wilkinson could never pay that, although she had heard some years ago that he had a good position. And Fred Gates—why, Fred had "bached it" in a room over her father's barn, and she used to carry him muffins and butter on Sunday mornings. And now he worked somewhere at the stockyards.

"I do—look—awful," was her conclusion his manner in spite of his abnormal bashfulness.

She went home and wrote a check for ten dollars. She had decided, after considerable reflection, that she would spare that much from the tiny savings of her slender salary as attendant upon a nerve-wracking invalid.

Then, before removing her wraps, and with some embarrassment, she gazed at herself in the mirror over the little painted bureau in her narrow hall bedroom.

—and of course we'll take off our hats—"

She suddenly recalled that Tom Wilkinson had seen her, twenty years ago, wearing a light blue gingham gown when he was cleaning her father's well. He had looked at her bashfully but hadn't said anything until he was quite at the bottom of the well, when he remarked sepulchraly, "I like blue."

Jessie hung up the limp muff in the wardrobe and sighed vaguely. "I wish I had something blue," she said.

For your Ice Box or Refrigerator

Ice boxes and refrigerators need frequent cleansing—need to be kept always in a sweet, sanitary condition. Gold Dust does this to the very best advantage, because it so thoroughly dissolves the grease. One housekeeper says she always uses Gold Dust for this purpose, because Gold Dust so completely cleanses, rinses so easily—no danger of 'soap left behind' in nooks and corners. (Adv.)

Jessie shivered at that. Poor old Fred!

The day before the dinner, her cousin's cook became ill. It was snowing, and the laundress hung the wet clothes before the lighted gas-oven to dry. Jessie was always expected to fit in where vacancies occurred, and she stood before the sink peeling potatoes and slicing them into a scallop for luncheon. Her cheeks were flushed with fatigue, but the unusual labor was a relief from the nervous strain of the parlor where the cousin sat in discontented comfort and nagged her dependents.

The earthy smell of the potatoes suggested the out of doors. The sun suddenly shone through the falling snow. Jessie opened the kitchen door and let the moist air come in. The delicate perfume from the wet clothes with the fire behind them stirred long forgotten emotions, long repressed impulses in her soul. She sliced the potatoes evenly and smoothly with a queer feeling that something big was behind the snow and the air and the perfume; that it was struggling to make an opening wedge enter her own shut-in, undeveloped spirit. She stepped to the window and looked up through the flying flakes of snow which glittered in the sunlight. The clouds were parting overhead, and through the rift Jessie saw a beautiful, transparent lake of blue. The opening wedge suddenly inserted itself.

"I'm going out," she said slowly and firmly, "as soon as I'm through with the dishes, and buy me a pale blue blouse to wear tomorrow night. I don't care,"—she answered some questioning of her mind—"I'm not afraid. I shall get a silk one." With an expansion that was like a breath of the snow-laden air, she began to sing as she sliced potatoes—an old love song of her academy days.

The difficult relative scoffed bitterly at the blue blouse when Jessie was dressed for the dinner, but being a woman of some elegance of taste, she gratified her fancy by making Jessie wear a wide, filmy, white scarf of her own, under which the blue silk gleamed like the sky through soft, white clouds. She accepted Jessie's fervent gratitude with a half contemptuous kindness, and finding the emotion agreeable, added to the toilet a pair of freshly cleansed white kid gloves.

Jessie had dropped a note to Tom Wilkinson to give him the address of the tea house, and had received one in return in which he suggested instead a small hotel near her, and took upon himself the needful arrangements about the dinner. In consequence, when Jessie, wearing her shabby coat and furs over her pretty toilet, arrived a bit early, she was ushered into a little private room in which a small, round table was prepared with silver and glass, and decorated with a low, spreading mass of early spring flowers, jonquils, primroses and daffodils.

As Jessie entered the room, a couple of plain, elderly people arose and stood a bit awkwardly. Then the man, who was stooped and partially bald, started toward her with hand outstretched. As he did so, he smiled—a frank, kind smile, and Jessie cried out with surprise:

"Why, Fred Gates!"

"Well, Jessie," said Gates heartily, "do you remember when you used to bring me muffins on Sunday mornings? Those muffins!—Jessie, this is Mrs. Gates. She's heard often about you."

Mrs. Gates came forward timidly. She had a plain, sensible face, and was sparsely dressed in a brown cloth gown. Jessie noticed that she wore no gloves on her capable, work-worn hands, and immediately drew hers off.

"I've heard a lot," said Mrs. Gates, "about how you and your mother took care of Fred when he was sick."

Jessie laughed gaily. She suddenly began to feel light-hearted and very happy. She was glad she had bought the blue blouse.

Fred Gates motioned toward the table. "Don't those flowers remind you of the old days at Arden? Tom Wilkinson telephoned out to me and asked if I couldn't rustle up some old-fashioned flowers; and sure enough, my wife had got these started in her greenhouse."

"O, you have a greenhouse?" Jessie gasped, "do you manage it while Fred—"

Mrs. Gates laughed. "Just a little one—on the farm. I like to work with flowers. We want you to come, sometime soon, out to our farm, and stay as long—"

A shout from Mr. Gates made the women turn. In the doorway stood a tall, angular, powerful figure in a great-coat. For an instant, Jessie was the prey of bewilderment and a confused sense of unreality, as both her hands were imprisoned by the greatcoated figure. But at the sound of a voice she knew, she realized that the figure and the keen, gray, spectacled eyes that were searching hers earnestly, belonged to Tom Wilkinson.

Not until the dinner had reached the coffee was there any mention of the Arden Memorial. The brightness, to Jessie, seemed to blot out the whole gray past, and in the faces of the other three she saw reflected her own enjoyment of the hour. When she suddenly recalled the meaning of the meeting, her face sobered to a look of sweet responsibility. She drew from her little silk bag a stamped and addressed envelope. "Now, perhaps we had better put our contributions to dear Professor Arden's memorial together in this envelope. It's all ready to send to Clyde Bryce—junior Clyde, you know. He's the chairman."

Tom, who had been leaning back with a wholly contented smile on his own face, and his eyes on Jessie's, started up with gleeful alacrity and thrust his hand into his breast pocket. From thence he drew a small, flat pocketbook, and from that a cheque. He handed the cheque to Jessie who received it with a serious air, and placed it, being very careful not to look at it, with her own in the envelope. Mr. Gates, too, with a humorous gesture and remark, pointed toward his wife, who also carried a little silk bag. From this a third cheque was extracted to go in the envelope.

"I feel 'most too solemn to say anything," Jessie remarked in a trembling voice, "I am so happy to think we can help even a little toward giving dear old Arden something beautiful; and it's so nice we can do it together."

Tom responded to that with vigor. "Together—that's the word! You tell little Clyde Bryce that it's your contribution. Fred and I are just the tail of the comet."

Fred laughed. "Tell him you earned that mite carrying hot muffins to a homesick chap baching it in a barn-loft."

"No, you needn't," protested Mrs. Gates, "tell him it's your reward for saving a husband for me by carrying him cold water in the nights when he had that fever."

An hour later, Jessie found herself being bundled by Tom into her threadbare little coat and shabby furs, and presently he and she were walking slowly over the two or three blocks between the hotel and her cousin's house.

"Jessie," said Tom eagerly as he poked the sealed envelope into a mailbox, "I've just found out something."

"What, Tom?"

"That I'm not bashful. Why, do you know that with the way I used to suffer with bashfulness when I was a boy, I simply never gave myself a chance to get over it. You know I never could speak to you if you were looking at me?"

"I know it, Tom."

"Well, since we left school, I've thought of you a million times, but upon my word, I was too bashful to write—or at least if I had written—to tell you I'd give all I had if I could see you—I knew if I were to see you, I'd just crumple up with bashfulness. I've been all kinds of a fool, Jessie. When you called me up the other day, I was glad enough it was the telephone, for I was sure that if you had come on me suddenly, I should have collapsed. And when I went into that room tonight, I didn't know whether I'd keep my head long enough or not to say how-de-do. But all of a sudden, when I did see you, and got hold of your hands, I found that I wasn't bashful at all. Now, I'm going to hurry right up and tell you—no matter what you think—that there never was any other girl in this world for me, and when I saw you tonight in that blue frock—or whatever it's called —I knew there never could be any other. And I'm telling you this in spite of the fact that you no doubt have never given me a thought, and that somebody else has probably come into your life—"

"O, Tom—never, never!" Jessie was clinging to the arm in the bulky sleeve of the greatcoat. "Why, Tom, I don't think anybody else ever wanted me—or at least not many—"

"That's right, tell the truth!"

"Well, nobody that I'd think of for a moment. And Tom—I—"

It was Jessie who was bashful now. She could get no further. She turned her face to the big sleeve.

Tom stopped and faced her. "Would you believe it?" he asked wonderingly. He put a hand under her chin. "I've got the sand to stop right here and ask you to kiss me!"

And he did—and she did—with an electric lamp shedding its revelatory rays about them, and pedestrians approaching from either direction.

As they neared their destination, Jessie snuggled up again to the big sleeve.

"Tom, I'm glad you have such a nice, warm coat," she said with a maternal air.

Tom rubbed the soft fur collar. "It's a dandy, isn't it? My Christmas present—employees of the Consolidated—"

"Did they?—did they give it to you?"

"Yes," he chuckled. "Guess they thought I needed it. Fact is I haven't had much time to think about clothes."

"Well, I think it was lovely of them. They must like you there pretty well, Tom." She looked up at him proudly with soft eyes.

"O, so-so. They call me 'the old man,' you know."

"Old man—nonsense! Why, Tom, you and I are just beginning to live, aren't we? And if we had got—"

"Married,"—supplied Tom unblushingly—

"Got married just after we left Arden, we might have been all settled down and the romance gone. And now we have it all to enjoy. It's so wonderful, isn't it?"

Tom murmured ecstatically and added: "Gee! I'm mighty glad I have a nice little home to take you to."

"Home!" Jessie gasped.

"You bet. You see I built it for my mother, and just as it was finished, she died."

"O, Tom—"

"And I never have lived in it. I wouldn't rent it, because—"

"Wasn't that too bad! That made it hard for you, didn't it? It must have cost you quite a bit—"

"Well, yes—but there's a lot I want to do to it now."

"You mustn't be extravagant, Tom, for you know I'm very simple, and a home—O, just any home—would be like heaven to me."

At that, Tom had to stop again, but in the shadow this time. When he left her at the door, he said: "I'll phone you tomorrow about five o'clock. We've got to make some plans, you know." Then he called her such a beautiful name that Jessie scarcely breathed on her way up-stairs, and when her head was on the pillow, she said the name over and over again to herself.

The following day was spent in attendance upon the invalid, who, having done amiable things the evening before, felt free to react to one of her ugliest moods. Jessie, however, was wearing a new armor which shielded her from all the darts of malice—the armor of Tom's love.

It was not until nearly five o'clock that she had a chance to open an envelope which had come special delivery an hour before. She found in it a typed letter signed by Clyde Bryce.

"We are in receipt," he wrote, "of your remittance of $1510.00—" ("Fifteen—what?" puzzled Jessie who wasn't quick at figures, "fifteen—no, one hundred and fifty—one—no, that couldn't be it—") "for which we thank you most cordially. That amount, coming just now, insures our raising the ten thousand for the memorial."

In a postscript Clyde had written: "By the way, how on earth did you hook those two big fish I've been angling

"Canning Time"

THIS is what ten correspondents admonish me is "upon us"—in terms more or less urgent. I put aside reluctantly dozens of letters upon other topics, none of which are uninteresting, to obey the will of the Majority.

With hoarse threats of "hard times and worse coming" sounding in our ears, we appreciate, as never before, that every fruit and vegetable which can be spared from today should be conserved in some way for future use. Among these "ways," Canning stands preeminent. Canned foods if properly put up and kept in a cool dark place, are practically indestructible by time. I wish I had room to tell the story of the discovery of a jar of preserved figs in Pompeii, which led a clever American to introduce the Art of Canning—eighteen hundred years old—into the United States.

Let me detail briefly the essentials to success in canning vegetables and fruits.

First—Heat! Have plenty of boiling water at hand for retaining the even and right temperature of every utensil used in the process. Cans and covers must be as hot as the boiling fruit or vegetable poured into the cans. Clean, new rubbers must be dipped into boiling water wiped and fitted into place as soon as the can is filled to overflowing. The heated cover is clapped on without the loss of a second and screwed down far enough to secure perfect exclusion of the air. Five minutes later, it must be screwed tightly into the place it will hold for months. This second screwing is indispensable. The glass and metal contract in cooling, and the altered condition must be met promptly. Repeat the tightening process as the jars cool.

Canned Asparagus

Cut off the lower and harder portions of the stalks. Nobody eats them when they are cooked, and they take room that should be filled by an edible. At least two inches of most of the asparagus stalks canned for private families, might be left out of the jar. It is literally "hard wood." Make asparagus-soup of it if you like. Have the stalks of uniform length so far as possible. Bring water, slightly salted, to a boil in a large kettle and lay in the asparagus previously trimmed and washed. Boil steadily until the heads are tender, but not until they break. Lift out gently with a large wooden fork, or a split ladle, and stand on end, the tips uppermost, in the heated jars which should be close at hand in a great pan of hot water. If practicable, the canner should always have an assistant who fits on the rubbers and tops without the loss of a second as soon as the asparagus is neatly packed in and the jar filled to overflowing with the boiling salted water from the kettle. This last must stand on the fire boiling steadily until the last jar is filled.

Let the asparagus cans cool in a dark room when you can. Light darkens canned foods. When the cans are perfectly cold, wrap in thick paper and set in a cool closet if you have no cellar.

Canned Stewed Tomatoes

Scald the tomatoes and skin them, laying them in a colander, after peeling, that the superfluous juice may drain away. There is sure to be more than you need. When all are ready, turn into a granite or a porcelain-lined kettle and bring rather slowly to a boil. Keep this up for fifteen minutes, pour off all the liquid that will come away without pressing, season slightly with salt, and transfer by the ladleful, hot-and-hot, to the prepared cans. Seal immediately.

Tomatoes Canned Whole

This is a far more delicate business than that described in the preceding recipe. Select the finest and ripest tomatoes and of uniform size. Lay in boiling water for a very few minutes until the skins begin to crack. Then, turn off most of the water and slip off the skins. Do this rapidly, pouring out more water every little while that the tomatoes may not soften too much. They should be firm to the last. As you remove the skins, lay the peeled tomatoes upon a broad dish lined with cheesecloth. It is best for several operators to be engaged at once upon this stage of the work. Have ready on the fire a broad kettle of boiling water. When all the tomatoes are skinned, put into the kettle enough to fill one of the heated cans. It may require six or eight. Cover the kettle after each instalment, and leave all the tomatoes in it at the side of the range for ten minutes. Pack them into a hot jar; fill with boiling water from the teakettle and seal instantly.

I have eaten tomatoes canned in this way, that were six months old and tasted when dressed and set on ice, almost like fresh tomato-salad. This in the dead of winter.

Canned Corn and Tomatoes

Boil two dozen ears of ripe green corn until the kernels are tender (no longer). While they are still boiling hot, cut from the cob with a sharp knife. Peel two dozen ripe tomatoes of fair size, and cut into small bits. Mix this with the corn, salt to taste, and put over the fire in a granite or a porcelain-lined kettle. Bring to a hard boil, cook for just one minute after this is reached, and pour at once into your heated jars. Seal immediately. When they are cold wrap each can in thick paper to exclude the light.

Canned Berries

Measure the berries, and put the sugar into a broad, shallow pan, allowing a heaping tablespoonful to each quart of the fruit. Pour the berries into a preserving kettle and bring slowly to the boil, stirring up from the bottom as they heat and dipping out the surplus juice. Meanwhile, let the sugar heat in the open oven, stirring to prevent scorching. Add it gradually to the cooking berries. Then you will see the wisdom of dipping out the superfluous juice. The combination of boiling berries and hot sugar will make all the liquid you need in putting up the fruit. Cook all together for ten minutes and can quickly, filling each can to overflowing. Seal at once and let the cans cool in a dark place. When they are perfectly cold wash those which are sticky on the outside, and tie all up in thick paper. Blackberries, raspberries, huckleberries and gooseberries may be canned in this manner, allowing twice the quantity of sugar to the gooseberries.

Canned Cherries

"Short-Stem" and Morello cherries are best for canning. The less-acid varieties are "dead sweet" unless sour be mixed with them. Allow half-a-pound of sugar to every pound of washed and stemmed cherries. Put the sugar over the fire with just enough water to dissolve it and cook to a thin syrup. If you can spare enough cherries to stem, mash, and strain, using the juice thus obtained for the syrup instead of water the result will repay the additional work. As the scum rises upon the boiling syrup, skin it off. It should be ready for the fruit in ten minutes if the boil be brisk. Turn the cherries into the syrup and cook for five minutes after the boil fairly begins and the contents of the kettle bubble all over the surface. Remove the cherries from the syrup; pack into pint jars set in hot water, fill with the scalding syrup and fit on rubbers and hot covers. Cherries canned thus make delicious filling for French pastry shells.

FROM a host of queries upon divers household topics—many of which are interesting and should be answered—I select, to vary the leading theme of today, two which are novel to some of us.

A cook left me recently who had many faults. I am glad she has taken her departure. But she could compound delicious "War Bread" as she called it. She said she put into it all the cereal "leavings" from the table—no matter what they were. She used whites of eggs also. The recipe which she left for me is absolutely worthless—as might have been expected! Do you know anything about this bread? If not, I dare hope that some wiser housewife than I, may take pity upon me and send in the recipe.—Mrs. D. J. B. (New Jersey).

The fraudulent recipe is a stock trick of discharged cooks. We shall have somewhat more to say before long of the War Breads. I should like to be able to supply the formula which our member asserts was delicious. The lists are open for competitors.

"In speaking of the uses of rice-water, you alluded to it as an invalid food. I have heard also of rice-jelly which is highly nutritious and palatable. Can you let us know how it is made?"—CORNELIA V. S. (Cincinnati, Ohio).

Wash a cup of rice and soak it for two hours in a cup of water. Have ready on the range a quart of boiling water, and turn the rice and the water in which it has soaked into this. Boil for three-quarters of an hour, then strain through a muslin bag. When it is cold and thick serve with powdered sugar and cream.

Growing Stronger

International Sunday School Lesson for August 4

Luke 2:42-52 and II Peter 1:5-8

Some Principles of Spiritual Developments

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

HOW thankful we are for this glimpse of the growing boy Jesus preserved for us in Luke's story of the visit to the Temple! No wonder modern artists have found it a favorite theme. Every school should have Hoffman's or Constant's beautiful picturization of the incident. It makes the mighty Redeemer more real to us to see him in process of growth through childhood and youth to full-orbed manhood.

This glimpse of Jesus which Hoffman gives helps us to teach because it shows us a critical stage in his growth. Perhaps it is true that the twelve-year-old Oriental is as mature as our lad of fourteen. But it is certain that the Teen Age is critical. It is then that the great changes of adolescence take place. It is then that the task of parent and teacher is most difficult. Let wise mothers remember that even Jesus caused his mother great perplexity! She could not understand him fully. We have the advantage of much able thought by wise students of childhood. Every household should possess at least one good book on its most important task, the guidance of growing childhood. If I could have only one, I would have "The Boy Problem in the Home," by William Byron Forbush. Every Sunday School teacher should read some book on the nature of her pupils, beginning with the section on the Pupil in the Teacher Training Course of her denomination. Above all we should study to know our scholars, in school and out.

For these are the formative years of life. Yea, more than formative, they are decisive. Dare we neglect to use our influence aright when we consider the importance of the outcome? Yet largely through lack of good teaching, these are also the years when we lose a large percentage of our boys and girls from the Church school! Why should we? It is a time of eager inquiry, as shown in Jesus here. It is the period when boys branch out for themselves, both in thought and action, no longer childishly dependent on parent or teacher. Then the time is ripe for guiding their maturing ideals into Christian channels, and to tie up their decisions to the organized Church and enlist them for life as soldiers in our great Crusade.

Growing Stronger Food for Souls

Growth of spirit is unconscious, like growth of body. You can't order a person to grow. But you can assist him to fulfil the conditions of growth. One of the essentials is the provision of nourishing food. When it comes to the food for growing minds, we must consider what hungry children we have. See to it that they get good mind food, or they will fill up on some pretty highly seasoned stuff. None of us want to give them the poor, wishy-washy stories that used to fill our Sunday School libraries. Public libraries will help you, if well managed and supplied. For list of books write to the Boy Scouts of America, New York City.

But we have a special task—giving them the best of all soul food, the Bible. It cannot be given them unprepared for their immature minds, any more than Paul could give the strong meat of the Word to the Corinthians. The wise and thoughtful teacher will find just what they need and prepare it attractively for them. Just to hand a boy a Testament is not enough. Let us beware of giving children a positive dislike for the Bible. They ought to find it as Ezekiel did, "like honey in my mouth for sweetness." But that requires a teacher who practices the 119th Psalm.

Another soul food is prayer. We must begin with repeating prayers but we must not stop there. And even in the matter of set prayers, our Sunday Schools are weak. How many prayers have you taught your class? I found a big boy who thought praying was repeating "Now I lay me down to sleep." He had never prayed except upon retiring, and had never asked God to do anything but take care of his own little soul! What a poverty-stricken prayer life! Are there not too many such? In a model school of religion which I have visited, the children have composed some beautiful prayers which are used in school and class. We must try to raise prayer to the heights of real communion with God where petition, intercession, thanksgiving are all transfigured by fellowship. Without prayer a soul does not attain its full stature.

Growing Stronger—Exercise

But we grow by what we do, even more than by what we eat. "Exercise thyself unto godliness" was Paul's injunction to the youthful Timothy. Bodily exercise is profitable, he declared, and just so, spiritual exercise is more profitable, laying hold on eternal life. Right conduct, the opportunity to express in daily life the ideals and principles of true Christianity, is essential to growing stronger. A monthly good turn by a class of teen age boys or girls, may result in more solid progress than any amount of talking to them. Try to plan for it—some real, hard service that demands the cooperation of all. Then supplement it by guiding individuals to do some sort of personal service for the class, the school and the church, and then for the community and the world. Gathering flowers for the pulpit and taking them directly after worship to the sick or unfortunate, collecting old burlap bags and selling them to help beautify the Church, making bandages for the Red Cross, and acting as Pastor's aids an afternoon a week to address cards, etc., are some of the practical things now being done.

We learn by doing. We pray better by praying, speak better by speaking, give better by giving. The first sphere of action is the home and no boy is a Christian in church unless he is a helpful, brotherly, obedient member of a household. Though Christ's genius flashed out in the Temple, he went humbly back to Nazareth and was "subject unto his parents." A disorderly, surly, unkind Jesus is unthinkable, though he was but twelve. When your class admits that, you can press home their duty to strive to be like him.

Wisdom, Stature and Favor

Luke's threefold statement of Jesus' progress through the teens is suggestive of what is happening in all our boys and girls today. They are in the period of most significant growth.

A growing mind which eagerly seizes upon new experiences. A trip to Jerusalem must have had a magic significance to a little Hebrew boy. Our boys profit tremendously by directed travel. It is a choice privilege for father or pastor or teacher to take a group of alert boys and girls to some historic site or great museum or teeming city. Don't go alone. These youngsters are expanding their minds by contact with life as well as books. They need the noblest fellowship that can be bestowed upon them, lest their standards be set by the street corner gang.

A growing social consciousness, no longer little childish egotists, but responsible beings. The normal boy in the teens begins to be impatient to go to work. He is no longer a dependent but a cooperator. He wants to put something into the common store of wealth and ideas, as well as to continue to take out. At twelve the American lad wants to enroll as a Boy Scout, promising to do a good turn every day and "to help other people at all times."

Peter's Golden Chain of Graces

Our closing reading in II Peter does not present an appalling list of hard requirements that would discourage a boy. It catalogs the qualities achieved by a normal, wholesome Christian as he advances in Christlikeness day by day and year by year. There are too many cases of arrested development in the Church: people who have stopped growing up into Christ in all things. Their souls have been stunted. Some of them act like big babies, and others like children playing in the marketplace. They forgot that the Christian life is a way of continual progress. If we stop growing, something is radically wrong.

Find in Peter's list the things you have not yet attained and press on. Hold out these ideals to the Class, to grow in Self-Control, in Patience, in Christian knowledge. Don't censure; inspire to better and larger things.

Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Astounding Facts in Sunday School Progress

IN the territory comprised by the International Sunday School Association, namely: United States, Canada, Mexico, Cuba, the West Indies, the Hawaiian Islands and Central America, there are now 197,203 Sunday schools. This means a gain of 21,518 schools since the Chicago Convention of 1914. These schools reported 1,886,821 officers and teachers and 17,236,227 pupils, a gain in the past four years of 2,208,761. Even these figures are below those of the Government Census which gives for all Protestant schools a total of over 20,000,000.

In the last four years nearly 63,000 Sunday School Conventions have been held averaging 43 Conventions every day for these years and in these Conventions all denominations have been brought together in a great brotherhood.

At the foundation of this great movement is the Cradle Roll, of which there are now 57,155 with an enrollment of 1,360,377 babies, a gain in the quadrennium of 325,490. At the other end is the Home Department with 33,710 separate school departments and 909,251 members who are pledged to regular reading of the Sunday school lesson and the Daily Bible Home Readings.

The Temperance drive in the Sunday school has brought about 4,102,179 pledges.

Think of a record of 10,096,723 people being visited in the last four years, with a personal invitation to unite with the Church and Sunday school! That is the record of the Home Visitation Department, which has conducted in various cities of this country a house-to-house canvass totaling now 47,800,000 during the last ten years.

But more encouraging still is the fact that 67,000 Sunday schools have observed Decision Day, and a record of 1,582,575 additions to the church from the Sunday school during the last four years, an average of 7,600 for every Sunday during the quadrennium. This is the continuing revival of which little notice is taken in the religious press. It is the mighty force which is preserving this as a religious nation.

The Sunday School Service Creed

The Buffalo Convention emphasized the need of Christian unity and adopted a Sunday School Service Creed which declared among other things:

"For the social solidarity of the race;
"For the recognition of the priesthood and kinship of every child of God;

"For Christian character, or vital piety, as the proper credential of the life that is led with Christ in God;

"For self-renouncing love as fundamental in the Christian social order;

"For the Christianization of all the relations of men;

"For the banishment of autocracy from every department of life;

"For the progressive realization of democracy, not only in the State, but also in the home, in industry, in education, in social life, in the church, and in all the institutions that touch the interests of our brother-men;

"For such a redefinition of discipleship as shall emphasize deeds and not creeds, as constituting the heart message of Jesus to our day;

"For the sharing of our good with all men, not withholding till they seek it at our hands, but freely giving, because we know their needs and we are brothers;

"For that exaltation of the little child which the Master's tender solicitude teaches, with all that such exaltation implies both for it and adults;

"For the peace of the world, as the normal state of man, even though we must employ force to secure it—a peace exalting the men and the nations that pursue it, and that shall endure, because based on love for fellow-men and not on selfish advantage;

"For the answering of our Master's prayer for his followers—That they all may be one; that the world may believe in His Sonship, and so be redeemed through faith incarnated in men and regnant in the institutions that minister to their life."

Why Are Some Motorists So Careless About Repairing Leaky Radiators?

THEY have a leaky radiator soldered and spend $10 to $25—lay up the car from three days to a week—then find the radiator weakened by the high heat of the soldering torch!

They ought to learn about "X" Liquid—

The only Scientific Process of permanently REPAIRING leaks without solder or welding; and without danger to the cooling system! And if the saving of $10 to $25 didn't interest them—they'd learn that "X" Liquid does a BETTER job—its proper use prevents future leaks—and it will positively abolish Rust and Scale in the cooling system.

"X" is a wonderful Liquid that is simply poured into the radiator. It instantly combines with the water and finds every leak—whether in the radiator, pump, gaskets, connections, or elsewhere. In 10 minutes "X" makes a permanent repair.

IT is a remarkable fact that the same "X" Liquid used for repairing leaks—will, if left in the water, loosen the rust and scale already formed. And by absorbing all free oxygen in the water, "X" WILL PREVENT NEW RUST AND SCALE FROM FORMING. This means a clean cooling system, a cooler, better-working engine and a SAVING OF OIL.

Do not confuse "X" with cements, powders or flaxseed meals in solid or liquid form. "X" is no more like these than vanadium steel is like pig iron. "X" will not choke the cooling system—and it cannot harm iron, steel, brass, or aluminum.

"X" Liquid is guaranteed to make good or your money back.

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

A Co-ordinated, Constructive Teaching

Being the Addresses Delivered at the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference, May 28-30, 1918

THE Conference of eminent Bible Teachers and Authorities on Prophetic Interpretation in the United States and Canada, held at Philadelphia May 28th to 30th, 1918, was the most notable and authoritative gathering of its kind ever held in this country. The finest consecrated scholarship of all the Christian denominations was represented, and the deliberations and addresses on "The Return of Our Lord and Related Events" possess a vital spiritual interest to Christian men and women throughout the world. In view of the extraordinary manifestations of interest in the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference, an arrangement was made for the publication by the Christian Herald of the proceedings and addresses of the Conference in a volume entitled "Light on Prophecy."

"Light on Prophecy" is published under the special supervision of the Committee of the Conference, and is the only volume to receive official authorization. The book is of 300 pages, containing all the addresses, about twenty in number.

Notable Speakers and Addresses

Below is a List of the Addresses Which Are Included in "Light on Prophecy"

- "Hath God Spoken?" and "What is to Become of the Church?"
By Dr. Harris H. Gregg, Pastor, of Winnipeg, Canada, an eminent Canadian Divine.
- "What Is Prophecy?"
and
"Where Is Christ Now and What Is He Doing?"
By Rev. John M. McInnes, of Syracuse, Secretary of the Montrose Bible Conference.
- "The Doctrine of Our Lord's Return"
By Dr. Mark A. Matthews, Former Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church.
- "The Answer to the Greatest Question Jesus Ever Asked," and
"What Manner of Persons Ought We to Be?"
By Dr. William B. Riley, of the First Baptist Church of Minneapolis, Minn., and President of the Northwest Bible School, Bible teacher and lecturer.
- "Did the Cross of Christ Fulfill All the Promises?"
and
"The Coming Glory"
By W. L. Pettingill, Dean of the Philadelphia School of the Bible.
- "God's Purpose in This Dispensation" and

A Bit of Color

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"I WAS rather unhappy, today," the girl told me, "until—" she paused. "Until what?" I questioned. "You'll laugh," the girl said, "when I tell you. But I was unhappy today until I passed a shop-window and I saw a bolt of silk that was displayed there. It was greenish blue silk with a touch of cool gray in the depths of it, and it made me think of the summer sea and happy little boats with silver-white sails and moist breezes!"

"I waked up this morning feeling—well, blue. And I couldn't shake off that feeling of depression. I kept remembering that there were red battlefields in Europe and that there were little children dying in the summer heat, right here in our city. And I kept thinking of tragic stories that I had read and heart-breaking songs that had been sung to me."

"I went about, for several hours, doing my regular work, dusting, and making beds, and setting the house to rights. I made little cakes—they were very nice little cakes, too—but that didn't seem to help any. And then finally, in desperation, I put on my hat and started out to walk away from my unhappiness. And I hadn't been out more than ten minutes before I passed that shop and saw the beautiful shimmering silk, the silk that made me think of such cool, beautiful, happy things. And I turned around and went home with my whole outlook on life changed!"

I smiled at her. For I understood. Oftentimes, when the world has been a rather bleak place I, too, have had my whole viewpoint changed by a dash of bright color, or a handful of flowers in a florist's window, or the smile on the face of a stranger child. I have gone out with blank loneliness in my heart and have come back, because of some tiny, colorful incident, to write the most joyous of verse. Oh, yes, I understood!

I KNOW a woman who has a most gorgeous drawing-room. It is filled with wonderful oriental rugs and bits of quaint carved ivory, and rosewood furniture. It is a dream-room—a room to come to when the world needs a bit of brightening, when there are decisions to be made and when comfort is needed.

And yet the woman who owns the room keeps it locked up. Not because she is selfish, but because she is afraid that the oriental rugs will wear out and that the rosewood furniture will get scratched and that someone will some day knock over and break one of the carved ivory figures. She has made that room, instead of the comfort and pride that it should be to her, a bug-a-boo, and a burden. It might be a blessing to her and it is very nearly a curse—for there are many nights when she lies awake in fear of moths and dust, lies awake to worry because her beautiful room may not always be beautiful.

I know other people who own pretty frocks and save them until the material is ready to go to pieces and the style is obsolete—save them because, if they were worn and enjoyed, they might not last long enough. I know people who keep their solid silver spoons shut away in a chest and use very cheap plated ware, except on company occasions. Silver spoons last through many generations and are a delight to the eye and yet these people take no pleasure in the possession of them. I know people who put high stone walls around garden places so that the passer-by will not stop and stare. And I know other people who wear their pretty frocks—wear them joyously—and in wearing them, give pleasure to others as well as to themselves. I know people who have beautiful rooms that they leave hospitably open in the face of dust, for dust can always be brushed away! Of course the frocks wear out, and the rooms grow a bit faded in tint, but their owners have enjoyed them—and the wearing out has been made worth while.

I DO not think that beautiful things should be hoarded, and tucked away from the sight of people. I think that they should be left out where folk may see and enjoy them. If it was right to own things and keep them hidden away, a trial instead of a blessing, God would never have starred his green fields with white daisies for every wayfarer to see—daisies that bloom and, after they have given joy, fade away. If God believed in the hoarding of things, the leaves on trees would be stiff metallic things that would never blow off in an autumn wind storm; and there would be no gold—gold that fades at the evening of everyday—in the sunshine, and no laughter in the eyes of little children!

No, God believes in putting beautiful things out in the great window of the world—displaying them as silks are displayed in the shop-windows. He doesn't hide His treasures from our sight; He puts them where they may be seen, and appreciated, and used. He places them, bits of light and fragrance and color, so that our eyes may find delight and our souls may find comfort in the joy of them.

Oh, friends of mine, if you own beautiful things enjoy them, and let others enjoy them! For God has given you these beautiful things for just that reason. He doesn't want you to hide them away so that they will always have the gleam of newness upon them; for of what good will their newness be if they are never seen? He wants you to keep them out so that they will brighten your pathway, and the pathways of people who, like the girl, need at the moment a bit of color or happiness in their lives.

I do not think that worth while things should be used carelessly, wastefully, for people who are not hoarders can very easily go to the other extreme. But I do think that beautiful things should be enjoyed. That is why they are beautiful! That is what makes them most beautiful.

The Unwitting Bait

for! And our President Wilkinson of the Consolidated—I work for them you know—coming down with a thousand! What bait did you use?"

The "bait," with big eyes and a paling face, stared again at the figures.

"It's—fifteen hundred dollars—and my ten!" She sat down stiffly on the cane seated chair.

A smart rap sounded on the door. "Telephone, Miss Jessie!"

She ran down the two flights of stairs. "It's Tom—O Tom—what does it mean?" She picked up the receiver.

"Hello—Tom?"

"That's you, Jessie. I know your voice, dear." Dear! That was even more beautiful than last night's word.

"Why, I've got my car in front of the office now, and I'm coming around to take you out to the home, Jessie. Say, Jessie, Mrs. Gates has just telephoned—says I must bring you to the farm for the week-end next Saturday. Can you go? Well, you've got to. It's a great place to go. Nice and old-fashioned. Lots of breathing space, too. They have a house with about twenty rooms—"

"Twenty roo—"

"And they have a lot o' help, but Mrs. Gates is the greatest worker—has a model dairy and a miniature greenhouse, and all sorts of things like that to play with. But I'll tell you all about it while we're driving. You'll enjoy this spin to the home, dear, it's over on the North Side—Lake Shore Drive, you know."

"Lake—Shore—"

"Say, Jessie—you haven't changed your mind since last night—about—what we were talking about?"

"Well"—breathlessly came the answer—"I don't know—"

"What?"

"No-no-no! Not that,"—her voice choked—"O Tom—come quick—I want to see you."

"Well—that's something like. I feel that way myself. I'll be with you in eight minutes if I'm not pinched on the way for speeding. Good-by!"

Jessie, with a trembling hand, replaced the receiver; then she ran to the parlor, where—to her own subsequent amazement—she dropped upon her knees by the old cousin's chair, and hid her face on the old cousin's shoulder.

That lady stiffened for an instant, then she looked down whimsically at Jessie's head, broke into a laugh and patted her face.

"Well, you are a nice little thing," she said.

Wonderful Grace!

and passengers perished. Dr. Spencer was at the time with his brother William, a student of Garrett Biblical Institute. Hearing of the wreck, he hastened to the scene, and in the work of rescue saved seventeen of the imperiled passengers before he himself fell in a delirium of exhaustion. Just before passing into unconsciousness, he repeated over and over again to his brother, "Will, did I do my best?" This question was taken up all over the country and furnished the theme of many an editorial, and the text for many a sermon.

One of the most striking things I know, however, in connection with the above incident is this: In a meeting, said to have been conducted by Dr. Torrey in a Californian city, Dr. Spencer was noticed in the audience, and desiring to pay tribute to one who had wrought so heroically in the days of his youth, Dr. Torrey asked Dr. Spencer to come to the platform. He was cheered to the echo. When he took his seat beside a friend of mine, who was also upon the platform, my friend turned to Dr. Spencer to say, "Is there anything special that you remember in connection with the seventeen persons whom you saved from the wreck of the 'Lady Elgin'?" Dr. Spencer hesitated a moment and then said: "Only this, that not one of the seventeen ever thanked me." And we have not thanked God for His goodness to us, and this sin too has been nailed to the cross.

Second: There is the sin against one's self, sins which undermine character, sins which weaken one's will, sins which blight and blast our lives: these sins, countless in number, are nailed to the cross.

Third: There are the sins against society, against our friends, our parents, our loved ones; sins which have made tears flow from the eyes of mothers and fathers, until the eyes have become red and the faces hot with the scalding tears. These sins are nailed to the cross. No amount of effort on our part can undo the sins which have been mentioned; but faith in Him who died that we might live is all powerful, and so when I read, "He hath taken my sins away," it is as if He had held these sins of mine in His own hand, and as He made His way to the cross to die, the innocent for the guilty, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God, it is as if the nail had gone not only through His hand, but through my sins as well.

Sins nailed to the cross are just as dead as before they were thus imprisoned, but the difference between the sins nailed to the cross, and the sins which I encourage in my life, is this: the one is deadly; the other, because of what Jesus Christ has done, has lost its power.

A Young Reader's Appreciation

MY acquaintance with the Christian Herald began more than ten years ago, when as a little girl of a dozen years of age our pastor sent me a six months' subscription. It is a splendid, wide-awake periodical, consistently doing its best to live up to the honored title it bears. Especially helpful and inspiring have been the series of sermons by well-known preachers of the Gospel, and the travel accounts of present conditions in foreign countries. Let us have more of them.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

"SOME trust in chariots and some in horses, but we will remember the name of the Lord our God." Throughout England people are uniting to pray for forgiveness and for victory. At one meeting 15,000 earnest souls besieged the Throne of Grace. In America in towns whose number increases day by day, the church bells are chiming at noon and the people are stopping as the bells ring out, to breath a prayer for the nation, for its army, for its navy, for our allies, and for that one particular boy whose life means most to him or her who prays. Miss A. E. H. of Troy, N. Y., recently sent to the Prayer League a copy of a statement of the Mayor of Troy as follows:

"I would, therefore, respectfully suggest that the pastors of the various churches throughout the city, regardless of their denomination, who do not now ring their church bells at noon, cause the same to be rung each noon during June, July and August, and that the people accept this signal as a call to prayer.

"In cities where this has been tried no inconvenience resulted. Even in the most crowded business thoroughfares the hurrying throngs stop, bare or bow their heads and stand at attention until the ringing has ceased, at the same time petitioning God to reward the efforts of this country and her allies with a lasting and noble peace. The moral effect thus created is really worth the effort."

Oliver Cromwell's praying Ironsides won their places in history both by their prowess at arms and by their prayers. A nation, which, as it fights, keeps itself holy through frequent recourse to the prayer of faith, must be invincible. God rules.

"Sick and in prison, and ye visited me." Mr. C. B., a Christian man, was sentenced to ten months' imprisonment on a charge, which his friends contend was unfounded, of trying to use the mails for fraudulent purposes. He is suffering much from his confinement, and from the after-effects of pneumonia, and his family is suffering from the lack of his support. C. B. has been a member of the church since his boyhood, and is a sturdy believer in prayer. Will our friends of the League join their prayers to those of this unfortunate man and his friends to the end that the authorities in Washington may look once more into the case, hear evidence that was not brought up at the first trial, and rectify the errors that have been made?

Miss A. H. tells of a revival, in answer to prayer, of the spiritual life of two Presbyterian churches, which are now talking of uniting, to their mutual good. She asks the prayers of God's people for more showers of blessing and a fuller baptism of the Holy Spirit.

Mrs. E. O. promised God that she would acknowledge before men God's mercy in the healing of her little boy, and now she wants to tell to the whole world the spiritual blessing she has received through prayer.

Mrs. L. L. C. praises the goodness of God in the healing of a friend who had been given up by her physician. She now asks prayer for the healing, if it be God's will, of another friend, the mother of several small children, who is losing her hearing.

Some time ago Mrs. M. O. H. asked prayer for the conversion of her husband, son and two daughters, and now she writes of a glorious revival of religion in her neighborhood, in which her husband and son gave their hearts to Christ. The League will continue to pray for the dear daughters, and also for two sons-in-law for whose conversion Mrs. M. O. H. is now praying.

Mrs. G. W. I. prays for God's blessing on the work of the physicians who have sought to relieve her of a cancer, and returns thanks for the safe return of a daughter.

B. J. C. asks prayer for the blessing of God on a church in Portland, Ore., that has been organized for the special purpose of uplifting the fallen. A regular pastor has been chosen, and great interest has been manifested in the work of the church. B. J. C. also asks prayer for the conversion of his four children.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Plehwille, Texas; Portland, Ore. (for a church that has lately been organized for the uplift of the fallen); Caxambas, Fla. (that many may be saved during meetings); Plymouth, Neb. (for the salvation of the world); Tallman, Mich. (for the success of the United Brethren work at Ludington, Mich.); San Marcos, Texas (that we may have a great revival); Berryville, Minn. (that a Sunday school may be organized, and a missionary may be sent); Rana, N. M.; Durham, Texas (for a world-wide spiritual awakening); East Tawas, Mich. (for prohibition throughout the country).

Mrs. E. A. C. asks prayer that son's mind may be restored; Mrs. F. B., that husband's mind may be restored; Mr. & Mrs. H. A. N., that daughter's mind may be restored; E. B. V., that daughter's mind may be restored; four friends, for mental restoration for themselves or friends.

Two parents ask prayer that sons' minds may be restored; E. A. W., that mother's mind may be restored; L. E. M., that two friends' minds may be restored; A. C. S., that own mind may be strengthened.

E. B. asks prayer that son's sight may be restored; three friends, that their mothers' sight may be restored; four friends, that own sight may be strengthened; a Member, that mother's sight may be restored; C. M. O., that husband's sight may be restored; A. L. M. A., that brother's sight may be restored; Mrs. A. B., that aunt's sight may be restored; Miss I. M. T., that own sight may be strengthened.

Six friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves, relatives or friends.

Thirty-five friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Five friends ask prayer for special blessing for others; including Mrs. L. G., that son who is in France may be remembered in prayer; Mrs. J. S. M., that son now in France may return safely; Mrs. E. C. M., that our soldier boys may be kept from sin, also the Y. M. C. A. workers.

Mrs. B. N. C. asks prayer that son may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. F. B., that three confirmed drunkards may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. G. G., that a friend may be cured of the habit.

Mrs. M. L. H. asks prayer that son may be cured of the liquor habit; A. C. S., that brother may be cured of the liquor habit; Miss I. M., that nephew may be cured of the habit; Mrs. C. P. K., that a friend may be cured of the liquor habit; a Reader, that a young man may be cured of the liquor habit.

O. N. asks prayer that a friend may be delivered from the drug habit; A believer, that a friend may be cured of the drug habit.

Seventy-six friends ask prayer for healing of friends or relatives; including Mrs. M. B. W., that son may be cured without an operation; thirty friends, for healing for themselves, including C. M. E., to be healed without an operation; another, Mrs. E. O., to be cured of terrible headaches; Mrs. C. M., that husband may be cured of heart trouble; Mrs. W. G., that minister may be restored to health and strength; thirty-six friends, for healing of self; Mrs. E. V. E., to pass safely through an operation; Mrs. G. V., to be cured of cancer; L. K., to pass safely through an operation.

Ten parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; three wives, their husbands; twenty other relatives and friends.

Nineteen friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Thirty-two friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including six friends who ask prayer for world-wide peace; Mrs. M. C. L., for rain in West Texas; two friends, for rain all over Texas.

Mrs. B. N. C. asks prayer that husband may be cured of smoking; Mrs. E. A. C., that son may be cured of the tobacco habit; J. L. B., that a friend may be cured of the tobacco habit.

Eleven friends ask prayer for the return of loved ones from the war.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

A Subscriber, Hattiesburg, Mass.; Mrs. L. L. S., Dallas, Texas; A. W., Rana, N. M.; L. K., Turtle Point, Pa.; A. F., Stoughton, Wis.; Mrs. J. W. K., Harlan, Iowa; R. E. J., Spring Valley, Ohio; A. H. Lacon, Ill.; A. T. C., North Leverett, Mass.; H. E. L., Austin, Texas; Mrs. E. C., Coahoma, Texas; M. R. L., San Diego, Calif.; Mrs. E. C. M., Minneapolis, Minn.; Mrs. W. H. P., Suffield, Conn.; E. M. K., Held, Ore.; Mrs. B. S., White Earth, Minn.; Mrs. J. T. S., Wilmington, Vt.; Mrs. M. B. W., McAlpin, W. Va.; A Believer, Hillside, Ill.; A Friend, Watertown, Tenn.; Mrs. M. H. ORDER THIS BIG FLAG TO-DAY AND UNFURL IT EVERY DAY

Up with the Stars and Stripes

THE least thing you can do for your country is to—show its flag. Let your neighbors know that yours is a patriotic home. Stand solidly behind the great principles of Freedom and Human Rights and let the flag tell it. At this critical time in the history of your country you should pledge your allegiance by displaying the Stars and Stripes.

Here is the very flag you have wanted—a large-sized "Old Glory" six feet long by four feet wide. It will add much to your celebration of National Holidays and local celebrations when the American Flag is indispensable.

The illustration is an actual photographic reproduction of this splendid large flag. To insure durability the stripes are double-stitched. Excellent bright colors, guaranteed not to fade or shrink. Pole is not included.

We make it easy for you to secure this splendid large flag. By placing an order for thousands of these flags we were able to purchase them at a considerable reduction. We will give you the benefit of this saving, and have made the terms so liberal that all may take advantage of this offer,—half the price of a similar flag if purchased in a store and at a time when it is most needed.

DON'T EAT THAT MEAL!

90% of all Sickness Caused by Wrong Eating

Stop combining foods at each meal that are chemically opposed to each other. These inharmonious food combinations literally explode in the stomach, liberating toxins which are absorbed by the blood and form the root for nearly all sickness, the first indications of which are stomach acidity, fermentation, gas, constipation and many other sympathetic ills leading to serious consequences. Give some thought to your eating. Learn how to select the right combinations of food. Learn how to eat in accordance with the requirements of your particular physical condition, your age, your occupation and the climate you live in.

Eat for Health

Do you know what foods make you fat? What foods make you thin? What causes fermentation—what produces acid stomach? What foods cause nervousness? What makes your liver lazy? What causes constipation and how to avoid it? What to eat and what to omit for stomach and intestinal diseases? Here is your chance to learn it all—to get the straight truth about foods and YOUR INDIVIDUAL system—to know what you should eat to meet the particular requirements of your particular physical condition, your age, your occupation and the climate you live in. In his Little Lessons in Corrective Eating, Eugene Christian, the Noted Food Scientist, gives you the benefit of his 20 years study of food and its relation to the human system. The Lessons contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon and dinner, curative as well as corrective, covering every condition of health and sickness from infancy to old age.

Young People's Topics for August 4

All for Christ. My Ambition

The Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic. Phil. 3:4-11

IN this series of discussions of "All for Christ," we began last month with the study of our abilities. All the reasons that would move us to consecrate our abilities to Christ would also move us to lay upon the altar of His service our ambitions, for abilities are powerless without the driving force of ideals, and ideals are only ambitions expressed. It is well to be ambitious; it is weak to be satisfied. We may not covet our neighbor's goods or anything that is our neighbor's, but we may aspire to leadership and influence. If we covet them and seek to gain them for selfish purposes or for mere personal aggrandizement, we build a house of cards which sooner or later will tumble ignominiously. If we seek them, however, that we may serve our Master better, and if we prepare ourselves in heart and mind for the best use of such power as He may give us, we may be assured that the eminences we attain will be reached on a thorough foundation that will not crumble. The best ambition, whether in young or old, is the ambition to excel in faith, in understanding of the Word and in unselfish service.

All for Christ. My Pleasures

Epworth League Topic. 1 Cor. 10:23,
24, 31, 33; 11:1

IT is a very safe rule that bars all pleasures except those that can be enjoyed with a clear conscience. Any pleasure which has even "the appearance of evil" is one that can safely be left alone. A great deal of discussion as to the righteousness and foolishness of certain diversions is more or less academic and beside the mark. A young Christian who is thoroughly in earnest and who is seeking every possible opportunity for spiritual service to his comrades and his community, will be so busy doing good that he will have no time to engage in any occupation serious or otherwise, which would be greatly open to question. There are certain amusements which are so generally used by persons having little or no spiritual interest, and which are so close to the edge of danger, that it is well for a person who wishes to influence others toward Christ to find his relaxation and amusement in other channels. Though it may be said that these amusements are not wrong in themselves, for a Christian they are unwise if they are doubtful and, in the spirit of Paul, are to be avoided lest they make some brother to offend. If our hearts and lives have been fully given into the keeping of Christ, we will find no hardship involved in the avoidance for His sake of those apparently harmless and possibly harmful pleasures, the participation in which we find it necessary to excuse to our own consciences and to our fellows.

The Church and the War

THE Stony Brook Assembly has arranged for a conference on "The Church and the War," to be held on the grounds of the Assembly at Stony Brook, Long Island, July 28 to August 2. Rev. Francis L. Patton, D.D., will preach the opening sermon on Sunday, July 28, and during the five succeeding days will deliver five lectures on War and Philosophy, War and Christianity, War and the Church, War and Democracy, War and Civilization. Each morning during the week from 9:15 to 10 there will be held a Service of Intercession, conducted by Rev. Robert Hugh Morris, D.D., of Stamford, Conn. From 10 to 11 each morning there will be an Open Conference. At night a Twilight Service will be conducted by Dr. William Hiram Foulkes.

The Negro's Pledge to "Old Glory"

AT the Conference of district superintendents in Columbus, Ohio, in connection with the Methodist Episcopal Missionary Centenary Program, Rev. C. A. Tindley of the Colored Methodist Church, addressing the conference on "The Invasion from Dixie," said: "I am begging you just now, representing these twelve millions, to remember you have had 1,500 years or more in which to make your climb. You have almost gone to the stars and are washing your faces in the upper dew before they come to earth. You have gone up to find the angels and walk upon the milky way. If we have not got up there yet, it is because the climb is hard, the road is long, and gravitation is tremendous."

Then turning dramatically to the flag, he cried:

"OLD GLORY, we have never stained you! and Old Glory wherever you go we have gone. We came from Bunker Hill to Antietam, from Antietam to San Juan Hill, from San Juan Hill to Mexico, and we are in the trenches now. Old Glory, when you come back will you give my race a fair chance to live? Old Glory, will you try our criminals with moral justice. But do not lynch them, give them a fair chance! If you do, we will clear your fields and stand with all your people on the edge of the Monroe Doctrine, daring any other nation of the world to trespass on it!"

How Northfield Helps to Win the War

NORTHFIELD Seminary is proud to furnish its quota to the army of women who are engaged, not only in the service of the Red Cross and similar organizations, but also in the raising of food supplies. Trained under the system of self-help which has been practised throughout the history of the School, Northfield girls have found themselves qualified to fill positions demanding administrative ability as well as practical knowledge. One recent graduate, Mary Frasca, of the Class of 1913, enjoys the rare distinction of being invited by officials of the Italian Government to take charge of a large relief work in Italy. This is a splendid recognition of the service rendered by this girl to members of her own nationality in the city of New York, after her graduation from the Seminary.

Visitors at The Northfield Conferences this year will find themselves interested more than in previous years in happenings on the Conference grounds from the frequent sight of a group of girls who are working on the Seminary farm. Their work is in every way satisfactory to the superintendent, and profitable to themselves in health, as well as in wages. Other students, who have gone to their homes for the summer vacation, are also working on farms. If the farmer's boy, who has been told that his hoe will be as valuable to the cause as a gun, feels a laudable pride in his patriotic service, then surely these girls and thousands like them elsewhere may feel an equal pride in the service they are rendering the Allied cause by this labor on the farm.

The PUNISHMENT

Margaret & Sanaster

A mortal man once wrote a book
About the elves of fairyland;
He said that magic was a joke—
[But, oh, he didn't understand,
For he had never learned to look
In forest glades for tiny folk!]
He said that gnomes were just a snare
That pixies weren't anywhere;
He said that mermaids on the strand
Were make-believes; that dwarfs and fays
Were dreams of medieval days.....
And so the fairy robber band,
With sword and dagger in its hand,
Went out to plunder mortal land.

They found his house, they entered in—
So silent that a dropping pin
Would make a clattering, and then
They crept into his writing room—
The little room he called his den.....
They took his pencil and his pen,
They took his blotters and his pads,
They took his manuscript, I think
They even took his pot of ink!
And then, ashake with silent laughter,
They hurried out.

The morning after
The mortal man sat down to write,
And rose again in sudden fright,

For, oh, his desk was blank and bare,
And all the things that had been there
Were swept away.

"My book!" he cried,
"Some thief has taken it to hide;
"My pencil and my pen are gone,
"And I am left alone, forlorn!"
He did not guess that elf and sprite
Had come to punish in the night

*But in the Woods the bells were ringing
And there were sounds of mirth and singing.
As filled with pride, the robber band
Trooped through the gates of fairyland*

How I Improved My Memory In One Evening

The Amazing Experience of Victor Jones

"Of course I place you! Mr. Addison Sims of Seattle.

"If I remember correctly — and I do remember correctly — Mr. Burroughs, the lumberman, introduced me to you at the luncheon of the Seattle Rotary Club three years ago in May. This is a pleasure indeed! I haven't laid eyes on you since that day. How is the grain business? And how did that amalgamation work out?"

The assurance of this speaker—in the crowded corridor of the Hotel McAlpin—compelled me to turn and look at him, though I must say it is not my usual habit to "listen in" even in a hotel lobby.

"He is David M. Roth, the most famous memory expert in the United States," said my friend Kennedy, answering my question before I could get it out. "He will show you a lot more wonderful things than that, before the evening is over."

And he did.

As we went into the banquet room the toastmaster was introducing a long list of the guests to Mr. Roth. I got in line and when it came my turn, Mr. Roth asked, "What are your initials, Mr. Jones, and your business connections and telephone number?" Why he asked this, I learned later, when he picked out from the crowd the 60 men he had met two hours before and called each by name without a mistake. What is more, he named each man's business and telephone number, for good measure.

I won't tell you all the other amazing things this man did except to tell how he called back, without a minute's hesitation, long lists of numbers, bank clearings, prices, lot numbers, parcel post rates and anything else the guests gave him in rapid order.

When I met Mr. Roth again—which you may be sure I did the first chance I got—he rather bowled me over by saying, in his quiet, modest way:

"There is nothing miraculous about my remembering anything I want to remember, whether it be names, faces, figures, facts, or something I have read in a magazine.

"You can do this just as easily as I do. Anyone with an average mind can learn quickly to do exactly the same things which seem so miraculous when I do them.

"My own memory," continued Mr. Roth, "was originally very faulty. Yes it was—a really poor memory. On meeting a man I would lose his name in thirty seconds, while now there are probably 10,000 men and women in the United States, many of whom I have met but once, whose names I can call instantly on meeting them."

"That is all right for you, Mr. Roth," I interrupted, "you have given years to it. But how about me?"

"Mr. Jones," he replied, "I can teach you the secret of a good memory in one evening. This is not a guess, because I have done it with thousands of pupils. In the first of seven simple lessons which I have prepared for home study, I show you the basic principle of my whole system and you will find it—not hard work as you might fear—but just like playing a fascinating game. I will prove it to you."

He didn't have to prove it. His Course did; I got it the very next day from his publishers, the Independent Corporation.

When I tackled the first lesson, I suppose I was the most surprised man in forty-eight states to find that I had learned in about one hour—how to remember a list of one hundred words so that I could call them off forward and back without a single mistake.

That first lesson stuck. And so did the other six.

Read this letter from C. Louis Allen, who at 32 years became president of a million dollar corporation, the Pyrene Manufacturing Company of New York, makers of the famous fire extinguisher:

"Now that the Roth Memory Course is finished, I want to tell you how much I have enjoyed the study of this most fascinating subject. Usually these courses involve a great deal of drudgery, but this has been nothing but pure pleasure all the way through. I have derived much benefit from taking the course of instruction and feel that I shall continue to strengthen my memory. That is the best part of it. I shall be glad of an opportunity to recommend your work to my friends."

Mr. Allen didn't put it a bit too strong.

The Roth Course is priceless! I can absolutely count on my memory now. I can call the name of most any man I have met before—and I am getting better all the time. I can remember any figures I wish to remember. Telephone numbers come to mind instantly, once I have filed them by Mr. Roth's easy method. Street addresses are just as easy.

The old fear of forgetting (you know what that is) has vanished. I used to be "scared stiff" on my feet—because I wasn't sure. I couldn't remember what I wanted to say.

Now I am sure of myself, and confident, and "easy as an old shoe" when I get on my feet at the club, or at a banquet, or in a business meeting, or in any social gathering.

Perhaps the most enjoyable part of it all is that I have become a good conversationalist—and I used to be as silent as a sphinx when I got into a crowd of people who knew things.

Now I can call up like a flash of lightning most any fact I want right at the instant—I need it most. I used to think a "hair trigger" memory belonged only to the prodigy and genius. Now I see that every man of us has that kind of a memory if he only knows how to make it work right.

I tell you it is a wonderful thing, after groping around in the dark for so many years to be able to switch the big searchlight on your mind and see instantly everything you want to remember.

This Roth Course will do wonders in your office.

Since we took it up you never hear anyone in office say "I guess" or "I think it was about so much" or "I forget that right now" or "I can't remember" or "I must look up his name." Now they are right there with the answer—like a shot.

Have you ever heard of "Multigraph" Smith? Real name H. Q. Smith, Division Manager of the Multigraph Sales Company, Ltd., in Montreal. Here is just a bit from a letter of his that I saw last week.

"Here is the whole thing in a nutshell: Mr. Roth has a most remarkable Memory Course. It is simple, and easy as falling off a log. Yet with one hour a day of practice, anyone—I don't care who he is—can improve his Memory 100% in a week and 1,000% in six months."

My advice to you is don't wait another minute. Send to Independent Corporation for Mr. Roth's amazing course and see what a wonderful memory you have got. Your dividends in increased earning power will be enormous.

VICTOR JONES

While Mr. Jones has chosen the story form for this account of his experience and that of others with the Roth Memory Course, he has used only facts that are known personally to the President of the Independent Corporation, who hereby verifies the accuracy of Mr. Jones' story in all its particulars.

Send No Money

So confident is the Independent Corporation, the publishers of the Roth Memory Course, that once you have an opportunity to see in your own home how easy it is to double, yes, triple your memory power in a few short hours, that they are willing to send the course on free examination.

Don't send any money. Merely mail the coupon or write a letter and the complete course will be sent, all charges prepaid, at once. If you are not entirely satisfied send it back any time within five days after you receive it and you will owe nothing.

On the other hand, if you are as pleased as are the thousands of other men and women who have used the course send only $5 in full payment. You take no risk and you have everything to gain, so mail the coupon now before this remarkable offer is withdrawn.

Questions and Answers

MANY readers of this paper write us in strong approval of the growing movement for daily prayer for the healing and forgiveness of our national sins, and for the triumph of our armies in the war. In a number of cities the daily prayer is now being offered. In Washington, D. C., the people at noon each day offer prayers for victory and peace. The President has authorized the heads of all government departments to sanction this observance. The Secretary of War permits a signal for the ringing of the bells to be fired from the top of an office building. The Public Utilities Commission authorizes the observance of the movement by street cars and traffic, which, on specified days, stops during the time of prayer. Large posters call the attention of the public to the necessity of prayer for the success of our Allies and for enduring peace. In New York City, the number of daily prayer meetings is growing. Many other cities are following this example, and we hear of similar conditions in rural localities. We would rejoice to learn that the noonday prayer had been generally adopted throughout the entire country.

S. O. G., Clear Lake, Iowa, writes: "President Wilson did a most commendable thing when he proclaimed a day of fasting and prayer to Almighty God that he forgive our sins and shortcomings as a people. We all know that there must be a ceasing or turning about from sin before there can be forgiveness. May I be permitted to mention a few evils that are sinful in the sight of God? There is intemperance, but we are thankful for the efforts that are being put forth to suppress it. There is Sabbath desecration, Sunday theaters and picture shows, excursions, ball games, etc. Then there are graft and greed, and unjust profiteering. God says in his Holy Word that he will not always chide, nor will he keep his anger forever. It looks as though he had turned his chiding into chastisement. No civilized or so-called Christian nation can sanction or approve of these evils, but they are all too prone to tolerate them.

The "poor pastor in North Carolina," whom many of our readers have helped, sends a grateful message. He writes: "I thank you and your readers from the bottom of my heart for the interest all have shown in my behalf. I wish it were possible for me to see and thank personally all of your readers who have had a part in this work in my behalf; but as I can't do that, I thank them one and all through your paper."

M. E. B., Joliet, Ill. One of the great ideas that Cecil Rhodes had in mind in establishing the Rhodes scholarships at Oxford was that the mingling and mutual understanding of students of all nations would make future wars impossible. This aim was unhappily frustrated, but the Rhodes scholarships have already played a great rôle in promoting understanding and fellowship among Americans, Englishmen, and those valiant half-brothers of both, the British colonials. For the time being the Rhodes trust has decided to postpone all further election to the scholarships. The four annual German scholarships to Oxford established by the will of Cecil Rhodes have been canceled by act of parliament, and these scholarships have been reallocated to the colonies, thus: one to the Transvaal, one to the Orange Free State, one to Alberta and Saskatchewan, one to Kimberley and Port Elizabeth (South Africa).

H. A. M., Luverne, Iowa. For entrance to the United States Military Academy at West Point candidates must pass a mental examination on various high school subjects. There is also a physical examination. A candidate must deposit $180 for clothing and books. For further information regarding admission, apply to the Adjutant General, War Department, Washington, D. C. Appointments are in the hands of Senators and Representatives.

H. H. S., Colton, S. D. To enter the Y. M. C. A. War Service, we suggest that you communicate with the headquarters of the Association at 347 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. If fitted for the work, it would not be necessary to have a college education, or, in some instance, even a high school diploma.

J. H. K., Peever, S. D. The Signal Corps enlist men of various trades, such as telegraphers, carpenters, machinists, plumbers, painters, etc. To enlist in a trade, applicants must be skilled workmen. The Aviation Corps of the Army is not accepting applicants at present. The Navy is in need of radio operators, but will accept no persons who cannot send and receive at least fifteen words per minute, Morse Continental Code. Men enlisting as radio operators in the navy are sent to the radio schools. All persons enlisting in the Army are given the fundamentals of army drill.

Mrs. N. McC., Crabtree, Pa. The Red Cross does not accept nurses except those that are graduates of regular training-schools for hospitals. The Red Cross requires that all applicants for nurses' positions for the service be graduates of recognized training-schools for hospitals. Vassar College is offering a preparatory course during the summer months. This course is open to college women who are intending to enter some nurses' training school or hospital in the fall. For full information communicate directly with the college upon the subject.

M. A. B., Wilson, Fla. If you wish to sell the old magazines in your possession for waste paper, we suggest that you communicate with your State Chamber of Commerce for the names of firms handling such goods. The average prices paid for such material are as follows: folded newspapers, from 30

J. W. W., North Little Rock, Ark. The word camouflage is pronounced as follows: kam-oo-flazh. Camouflage is a French word for the military art of concealing fortifications, ships, guns, etc., from the observation of hostile aircraft. It consists in painting objects of war so that they will blend readily into the landscape, or in concealing them by screens.

A. D. R., Quincy, Mich. Liquid fire is applied with a hose-like apparatus for hurling jets of liquid flame. It was studied and perfected in Germany several years before the war. Under combustion, the combination of oils, gasoline and pitch gives a thick, grayish smoke, which obscures the vision of those under fire.

C. L. B., Berne, N. Y. The words "United we stand, divided we fall," were the motto which appeared on the Revolutionary flag, under the picture of a snake divided in sections. It first appeared in literature in the poem by George P. Morris, entitled "The Flag of Our Nation."

Mrs. W. I. G., Nazareth, Pa. 1. General Pershing is the youngest man of his rank in the United States Army. He is fifty-three years old, and graduated from West Point in 1886 as senior cadet-captain, the highest honor any undergraduate can achieve. He began active service at once as Second Lieutenant of the Sixth United States Cavalry, one of the regiments that were sent to round up the old Indian chief Geronimo. After his Indian campaign General Pershing was assigned to West Point as instructor, but when war with Spain was declared he at once applied for the command of the old "Tenth," and with his regiment he distinguished himself in the field. In January, 1916, General Pershing was assigned to the command of the Eighth Brigade of the Regular Army, with headquarters at El Paso, Texas. In 1906 President Roosevelt, recognizing his ability, appointed him a Brigadier-General. On the death of Major-General Funston, General Pershing succeeded him in rank and command. He had command of the first American troops ever ordered across the ocean to battle in Europe. 2. General Ferdinand Foch was born in 1851 at Tarbes, Lorraine. He fought as a subaltern through the Franco-Prussian War. After the close of the war he moved to France. He was for many years instructor in the War School, and at the outbreak of the European War, was placed in the army corps. General Foch was joint hero with Joffre in the battle of the Marne, and has distinguished himself on many occasions. He was recently made generalissimo of the Allied armies in France.

Allies Drive Back the Huns

A Great and Sweeping Victory in the Second "Battle of the Marne," Foch's Triumphant Offensive

THURSDAY, July 18th, will long be memorable as marking what may prove to be the turning point of the great war. On the early morning of that day, the Allies, who for forty-eight hours had been preparing a withering attack along the 28-mile front from Soissons to Rheims, began the long-looked-for counter-offensive.

For a week it has been evident that the Germans had planned to envelop the Rheims district, including the city itself. General Foch, however, had foreseen this. When the Germans let loose the fifth of their series of drives, on July 15, although they pushed across the Marne and made a feint toward Paris, their real objective, as the events of later days seemed to show, was to reach Chalons, from the west and from the north and thus to encircle Rheims. But why did Germany seek at such terrible cost to take the empty shell of what was once the beautiful cathedral city of France? Partly because her salient reaching to the Marne was too narrow for comfort; largely because Rheims, which for four years has been a helpless target for the Huns' murderous guns, enfolds the soul of France. Clearly the German hope was that, with the Kaiser's troops in possession of this cherished shrine, the French morale would weaken to defeat. That hope, however, has been quickly blasted, for before sunset of that eventful Thursday, the Germans were forced to retreat at almost every point of the long line from Soissons to east of Rheims leaving fields littered with their dead, and thousands of prisoners, and hundreds of cannon and innumerable machine guns in the hands of the victorious Allies.

DURING Tuesday and Wednesday the Germans, balked east of Rheims, held fast west of Rheims almost to the Marne, fought desperately to widen their occupied ground south of the river and to force on the point of their wedge over the six miles separating them from Epernay. They made slow progress against constantly more furious French and American resistance. On Thursday the French began to press them back and Thursday night saw the wedge being battered back and pinched in although the fighting was still furious. Epernay was relieved of pressure. The Mountain of Rheims, ten miles south of the cathedral city, three days the scene of fierce German assaults, in which the enemy forces had finally succeeded in penetrating the wooded section about a mile and a half was completely retaken by Italian troops in a ruthless counter-attack. East of Rheims, all that had been lost in the previous fighting was recaptured, and the French retook Prunay removing the threat from the east against the city while American troops near Massiges restored their positions. Before noon, it was known that Rheims was safe.

FOLLOWING a night in which thunder storms had swept the whole fighting area and in which every hour had seen French tanks and American troops poured into the Allied positions in the woods of Ritz and Villers Cotterets, without preliminary gunfire to alarm and warn the enemy, but with only a barrage before the advancing infantry, the American troops from Dammard to Chateau Thierry pressed forward. As soon as they were well under way the French advanced. Simultaneously the French moved eastward from Fontenoy and an American force on their right started for Soissons.

Within six hours the French and Americans, working together, and sweeping forward $2\frac{1}{2}$ to $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles retook enemy territory virtually double in extent to that covered by the Germans during the preceding three days. From the Aisne to the Marne, Allied forces swept on, although there were points where they encountered stiff resistance. Some sanguinary fighting took place north of the river Ourcq, and as far as the Belleau Wood section. But the Allies were not to be denied. It was their day, and they swept all obstacles aside. Their aviators cooperated effectively at many points along the line, both in routing enemy aeroplanes and in dropping tons of explosives on enemy batteries and machine-nests.

AN idea of the wide sweep of the Allied offensive may be gathered from the fact that in the single day's fighting, over twenty towns, from Soissons to the Marne, were recaptured, including the following: Vincelles, Belleau, Civry, Etrepilly, Monthiers, Torey, Liey-Glignon, Hautevesnes, Montecouye, Gengoulphe, Festigny, Mezy, La Chappelle, Monthodon, Creeancy, Verzy, Viller-Heldon, Mont de Paris, Dammard, and others.

Many instances of the fighting related in the cable dispatches show how much of the result was due to the splendid courage and resistless dash of our American troops. With the impetuosity of high zeal and the precision of intelligence and training, our troops showed in this great offensive the irresistible fighting qualities which must teach Allies and enemies alike that the American forces are to be a determining factor in the war. At the beginning of the Allied offensive, it was estimated that the German forces along the entire line and back of it, aggregated 600,000 men, independent of reserves. The total strength of the Allies is not given, but it is stated that there were nearly 300,000 Americans engaged in the offensive, the greater part of them being in the action of the 18th.

General Pershing's news of the victory of Monday and Tuesday south of the Marne cabled to Washington on July 18, confirms the previous reports that the enemy was driven across the Marne by our troops wherever they came in contact.

Tales of heroism are related showing how small groups of Americans, greatly outnumbered by the enemy, succeeded in capturing hundreds of Hun prisoners. American marksmanship with cannon and rifle did some startling work that day. In the woods south of Mezy, which were swept clear of the enemy by our troops, it is said that the bodies of dead German soldiers in many places where they had been fighting in close formation, were found three and four deep—the result of going up against American machine guns and rifles with American doughboys behind them. In one large wooded section, there were over 5,000 dead; all said to have fallen in two days' fighting. According to the usual ratio of killed and total casualties, this would be held to mean a loss of 20,000 men to the Germans in that single section of the conflict. The Kaiser's famous Tenth Guard division, which crossed the Marne to storm the American position, was practically annihilated. Very few got back. The same happened to the Sixth German Grenadiers, a battalion of which was wiped out while another battalion had one company left.

THE enemy quickly recovered from his surprise at the Franco-American attack between the Aisne and the Marne and by noon of the 18th his reserves were being thrown into action to stop the Allied advance. It slowed down but could not be stopped. By evening, the entire plateau south and west of Soissons was in American hands and a severe defeat had been dealt to enemy masses which had tried to retake it. On the 19th the battle continued with added fierceness, the Germans bringing up storm troops, which had been intended for the attack on Epernay, and throwing them against the advancing French and Americans. During this day also the Germans succeeded in part in restoring their artillery situation, so that the advance was against a hell of shell fire as well as against machine-guns. Nevertheless the advance continued. Foot by foot, yard by yard, the new American regiments and the battle-tried French pressed back the desperate enemy, the second day's advance averaging a mile and a half.

The advance of the 18th put the Americans and the French south of Soissons, across the highroad to Chateau-Thierry and brought the main railway supplying the Germans in the whole salient under the fire of the French guns. Soissons was dominated and useless to the enemy, who made, throughout the 19th, hard pushed attempts to drive the Allies back, and to remove the threat against the Teuton communications. These attacks resulted only in greater loss of men and ground.
